PROCEDURE UNDER NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate took a recess yesterday the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] had the floor and expressed the hope that he would be able to conclude his remarks this morning. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WAGNER and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from New York and to other Senators for routine matters.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, a few weeks ago the Brookings Institution published a very penetrating and expert study of the administrative process, by Frederick F. Blachly and Miriam E. Oatman, entitled "Federal Regulatory Action and Control." Because of the widespread interest in the subject, with particular reference to the National Labor Relations Act, I wrote to Dr. Moulton, president of the institution, requesting an analysis by the authors of the various steps in the procedure under the Labor Act and a comparison of such procedure with that of other quasi-judicial agencies established by the Federal Government from time to time.

This analysis has now been completed. I desire to call to the special attention of the Senate Dr. Blachly's concluding statement:

> It should be noted that the procedure before the National Labor Relations Board is far more comprehensive than before any other authorities issuing cease and desist orders, and is more in conformity with a strict due-process-of-law procedure than the procedure of any other authority issuing cease and desist orders.

This analysis and conclusion by an outstanding and disinterested student of the subject should go far to dispel misconceptions about the administrative procedure under the Labor Act. As I recently stated to the Senate, investors under the Securities and Exchange Act, and businessmen under the Federal Trade Commission Act, among other economic groups under the various regulatory statutes, now enjoy the advantages of an administrative procedure similar to that established for the redress of labor's rights under the Labor Act. It cannot be too often recalled that the Supreme Court has held again and again that the procedure of the Labor Act safeguards every constitutional right of employers and employees. As Chief Justice Hughes said in the very first cases under the act to reach the Supreme Court:

> The act establishes standards to which the Board must conform. There must be complaint, notice, and hearing. The Board must receive evidence and make findings. The findings as to the facts are to be conclusive, but only if supported by evidence. The order of the Board is subject to review by the designated court, and only when sustained by the court may the order be enforced. Upon that review all questions of the jurisdiction of the Board and the regularity of its proceedings, all questions of constitutional right or statutory authority, are open to examination by the court. We construe the procedural provisions as affording adequate opportunity to secure judicial protection against arbitrary action in accordance with the well-settled rules applicable to administrative agencies set up by Congress to aid in the enforcement of valid legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that my letter to Dr. Moulton, of the Brookings Institution, the reply thereto, and the report by Dr. Blachy be printed in the body of the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with reference to the request made by the Senator from New York, may I state that the report to which he refers, as I understand, is part of a statement by Mr. Blachly and his wife.

I have had an opportunity of examining only a few pages which were preliminary galley-proof sheets of a chapter relating to judicial review. My hasty examination of these pages leads me to the conclusion that some of the views expressed are not in harmony with a proper interpretation of constitutional limitations.

I have prepared some brief comments upon the report which later I may ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the letters and report were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., March 15, 1940.

Dr. HAROLD G. MOULTON,
Brookings Institution, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR DR. MOULTON: I have read with the greatest interest the latest publication of Brookings Institution, entitled "Federal Regulatory Action and Control," by Frederick F. Blachly and Miriam E. Oatman.

I would deeply appreciate having an analysis by the authors of the various steps in the procedure under the National Labor Relations Act, and a comparison of such procedure with that of other quasi-judicial agencies established by the Federal Government from time to time.

Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT F. WAGNER.

THE BROOKINGS INSTITUTION,

1. After expiration of period for filing exceptions, the Board may decide the matter:

(a) Forthwith upon the record;

(b) Or after the filing of briefs, or after oral argument;

(c) Or may reopen the record and receive further evidence;

(d) Or may close the case upon compliance with the recommendations of the intermediate report;

(e) Or may make other disposition of the case.

2. Board notifies parties of time and place for the submission of briefs or oral argument.

5. Board may permit charge to be filed with it directly or:

(a) Transferred to it and continued before it;

(d) Make other disposition of the case.

7. Party desiring to take exception to proposed findings of fact, proposed conclusions of law, and proposed order, files exceptions and serves copies in other parties and regional director. Upon proper cause shown, the Board may extend the period within which to file a statement of exceptions.

9. The Board shall notify the parties of the time and place for any such submission of briefs and oral argument.

10. Thereafter the Board shall forthwith decide the matter or make other disposition of the case.

Exceptions:

Any party who wishes to take exceptions to any matters shall transmit his exceptions to the Solicitor. If exception is taken to any tentative finding of fact, reference must be made to pages or parts of record relied upon.

A party filing exceptions shall state in writing whether he desires to make an oral argument before the Secretary.

Where party admits the facts and waives a hearing, he does not necessarily consent to final order of Secretary, and in such case an examiner's report should be prepared and copy filed with respondent giving him an opportunity to file exceptions (Memoranda for Mr. C. W. Kitchen, in Attorney General's committee. The administration of the Packers and Stockyards Act, p. 67).

Procedure before the Secretary:

If oral argument before the Secretary is desired, such an opportunity is afforded and a date is set.

If oral argument is heard in any proceeding by the Secretary or Acting Secretary, the final order in the proceedings shall be issued by the person who heard the argument.

An application for rehearing, reargument, reconsideration, or modification of a final order must be made by a petition filed in duplicate with the Secretary. The petition must state specifically the grounds relied upon. A copy of such application filed with the petitioner or defendant is transmitted by the Secretary to the adverse party.

Exceptions:

Attorneys or other persons served with a copy of the report of the trial examiner may, within 10 days, file in writing their exceptions, if any, to report. They must specify particular parts of report to which they take exception.

Seven copies of the exception must be filed.

If exceptions are to be argued, it is at time of final argument upon the merits.

REOPENING OF PROCEEDINGS

Commission may order reopening of proceedings if conditions of fact or law have changed or public interest requires.

NOTE.—There are some further procedural steps such as review by the Review Division which do not appear in the Rules and Regulations as published.

It should be noted that the procedure before the National Labor Relations Board is far more comprehensive than before any other authorities issuing cease and desist orders, and is more in conformity with a strict "due process of law" procedure than the procedure of any other authority issuing cease and desist orders.

It should be noted that the procedure for cease and desist orders under the Commodity Exchange Commission Act is very similar to that under the Packers and Stockyards Act.

III. SIGNIFICANCE OF PARTICULAR RULES AND REGULATIONS AS TO PROCEDURE, ISSUED UNDER SECTION 10 OF NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD ACT

Hence the requirements that charge be in writing, be under oath, be signed, give a concise statement of facts, and give name and address of person against whom the charge is made.

2. In re complaint and notice:

Before formal proceedings are started against a person it is important for the administrative agency to know that there appears to be good ground for the issuing of the complaint. From the viewpoint of the one complained of, it is only fair that he shall know who made the complaint and exactly what charges are contained in the complaint; also that he shall receive notice as to the time and place of the hearing. Amendment to the complaint may be important from the viewpoint of the Government in its prosecution of the case, and also from the viewpoints of both complainant and respondent. A review of a refusal to issue a complaint may be necessary to prevent unjustified or arbitrary action on the part of the regional director.

3. Answers:

Answers to complaints accomplish several things:

a. The answer may sufficiently explain a situation, so that no further action need be taken.

b. An answer may well act as a demurrer, by acknowledging that charges are true but holding that even though true there was no illegal action.

c. The answer gives a clear ground for defense and thus constitutes one side of a basis for a hearing.

Requiring the answer to be in writing and to be sworn places the document on a formal basis, and prevents mere evasive or frivolous answers.

Serving the answer upon other parties gives them an opportunity to develop their side of the case.

Amending the answer by the respondent permits him to meet amendments in the complaint.

4. Motions:

(a) By motions the opposing parties and the Government are informed as to actions which the respective parties think should be taken in respect to the complaint.

(b) The provision that the trial examiner shall rule on motions helps to expedite the case.

(c) By the filing of rulings on the motions, the basis of an appeal on rulings considered wrong is laid.

(d) Service of rulings and orders upon each of the parties, or inclusion of rulings and orders in an intermediate report, gives all parties a chance to know what they are, and to contest them if this seems advisable.

(e) When the rulings are made a part of the record, both the Board in considering the record, and the court if the case is appealed to it, find the rulings valuable as showing whether the trial examiner has acted arbitrarily or without due care.

5. Intervention:

(a) The right of intervention gives those interested an opportunity to participate in the case in order to protect their interests.

(b) The requirement that interveners shall file motions in writing setting out their grounds for intervention prevents unnecessary and uncalled for intervention.

6. Witnesses and subpenas:

(a) The examination of witnesses under oath is required for the purpose of eliciting truthful answers, and further for the purpose of placing the one who answers falsely in the position of a perjurer.

(b) The Board may issue subpenas requiring the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence. The regional director may grant or deny an application for subpenas made by any party prior to the hearing, or may refer it to the trial examiner, who may grant or deny the application. The reason for this limitation is to prevent careless use of the privilege.

7. Hearing:

(a) A hearing before the trial examiner rather than the Board is necessary because of the great number of cases that must be handled each year.

(b) It is the duty of the trial examiner to inquire fully into the facts as to whether the respondent has engaged in, or is engaging in an unfair labor practice affecting commerce, as set forth in the complaint or amended complaint.

(c) The regulation that in such hearing the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling is based upon the statute, and is necessary for the purposes of expediting matters and preventing the great delays caused by regular court procedure.

(d) The rule providing that stipulations as to facts may be introduced in evidence is also adopted for the purpose of expediting the hearing.

(e) The ability to object to the conduct of the hearing or to the introduction of evidence, with the grounds for such objection, gives each party the opportunity to—

1. Have the objection considered by the trial examiner.
2. Have the objection reviewed by the Board.
3. In final analysis have the objections reviewed by the courts.

(f) The provision that no such objection shall be deemed waived by further participation in the hearing makes it possible for the hearing to be continued without either party's forfeiting his rights of objection.

(g) A reasonable period for oral argument makes it possible for both parties to sum up the evidence upon which the trial examiner makes his intermediate report. The reason for not including oral argument in the stenographic report unless the trial examiner so directs is that it is argument and not evidence to be used as a basis for fact finding.

(h) The filing of a brief with the trial examiner makes it possible for the parties to present to the trial examiner, prior to the preparation of his intermediate report, their views as to the proper interpretation of the evidence.

(i) The provision that at any time prior to the service of the intermediate report the chief trial examiner, upon appropriate notice to the parties, may direct that the hearing be reopened, is for the purpose of giving a further opportunity to present evidence in case new circumstances have arisen, or in case the chief trial examiner deems that the evidence is incomplete.

(j) The rule permitting exclusion from the hearing of persons guilty of contemptuous conduct makes for order and decorum at the hearing.

(k) Unless witnesses can be made to answer questions the most vital facts may not be brought out; hence the provision that refusal of a witness at a hearing to answer any questions which have been ruled to be proper shall, in the discretion of the trial examiner, be ground for striking out all testimony previously given by such witness on related matters. This prevents a witness from making a careful selection of facts favorable to his own side of the case, setting them forth on the witness stand, and repressing facts of equal importance which, if brought out, would benefit the other side.

(l) The provision for an intermediate report by the trial examiner is of great importance to the parties; as well as to the Board itself. Since the intermediate report contains both findings of fact and recommendations as to the disposition of the case, the parties are able to know in a preliminary way what is the opinion of the Government as to the meaning of the facts, what conclusions it draws from the facts, and what affirmative action is contemplated. The intermediate report also gives the Board a summary of the evidence, and a plan of action, which (though it is not necessarily followed) is of great assistance in the disposition of the case.

(m) The rule providing that any party may file with the Board at Washington a statement setting forth exceptions to the intermediate report or to any other part of the record or proceeding gives to both sides an opportunity for entering formal protests against any aspect of the trial examiner's activities which they consider illegal or inequitable. It also enables the Board to know and consider the objections made by private individuals or Government attorneys to the procedure, the tentative fact finding, or the recommendations. It also serves as a basis for further action by the Board.

(n) The provision that no matter not included in a statement of exceptions may thereafter be objected to before the Board makes the pleadings before the Board definite and specific, gives the opposing attorneys an opportunity to prepare arguments relevent to the matters which will be discussed, and precludes "surprise" objections at the time of the Board hearing. Failure to file such exceptions acts as a submission of the case to the Board upon the record. This is a necessary requirement, which prevents cases from being unduly drawn out. Obviously, if a person does not file exceptions when provision is made for doing so, he should not be allowed to prolong the hearing before the Board by introducing exceptions at this point.

(o) Provision that the regional director shall forward to the Board the entire record of the case as developed before the regional director and the trial examiner, including the charges and complaint and amendments thereto, motions, rulings, orders, stenographic report of the hearing, stipulations, exhibits, documentary evidence, depositions, and the intermediate report and exceptions, gives the Board a complete basis for the review of the case.

(p) With this material before it the Board may begin to consider the case upon the expiration of the period for exceptions. It may do so forthwith upon the record if no exceptions are filed; it may accept briefs or permit oral argument; or it may reopen the record and receive further evidence.

The reason why it may decide the case upon the record, in the absence of exceptions, has been sufficiently explained.

Permission to argue the case orally or to file briefs gives the party deeming himself injured by the intermediate report, or by the procedure before the trial examiner, opportunity to present his case in a clear and forceful way. The statutory provision (29 U. S. C. 160 (f)) for judicial review of final orders of the Board serves to prevent it from refusing permission in an arbitrary way. Since the parties must be notified of the time and place for the submission of briefs or oral arguments if such permission is granted, and of the time and place for the taking of further evidence if this is to be done, they can act to protect their interests.

(q) The closing of the case when the trial examiner has found in his intermediate report that the respondent has not engaged in and is not engaging in any of the alleged unfair labor practices, and when no exceptions are filed, expedites the settlement of controversies.

(r) The reopening of the record for further proceedings, upon motion and upon proper cause shown, makes it possible for the parties to introduce new evidence. Under the same circumstances the Board can secure additional evidence if this appears necessary.

(s) The provision that the Board may permit a charge to be filed with it directly, or may, at any time after a charge has been filed with a regional director, order that such charge and any proceeding instituted in respect thereto shall be transferred, consolidated with, or severed from any other proceeding accomplishes the following results:

1. It permits the Board itself to take direct jurisdiction over large and important cases.

2. It enables the Board to consolidate cases that involve similar questions, and thus to expedite matters.

3. It permits the Board to sever from other proceedings those which by their nature should be handled separately.

(t) The provision that after the above transfers to the Board have been made, cases shall be conducted according to the procedure set forth in sections 3 to 35, inclusive, of article II, means that the Board will act as carefully as a trial examiner is required to do.

(u) When the Board has assumed jurisdiction as outlined above, it may (a) direct the trial examiner to prepare an intermediate report; (b) reopen the record and receive further evidence, or require the taking of further evidence; (c) issue proposed findings of fact, proposed conclusions of law, and a proposed order; or (d) make other disposition of the case. In other words, the Board may take the type of action which the situation demands.

(v) The rights of the individual are protected when the Board itself takes jurisdiction over the case by the fact that the parties may file exceptions to its proposed findings of fact, proposed conclusions of law, and proposed order, as well as by the possibility of judicial review over its final orders.

(w) The provision that until a transcript of the record in a case has been filed in a court, the Board may at any time upon reasonable notice modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any findings of fact, conclusions of law, or order issued by it gives the Board freedom in making adjustments which appear to be advisable before the matter is brought into court. It serves also to minimize the litigation necessary to the protection of individual rights by opening the way to a satisfactory adjustment out of court.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE MOTHERS OF SONS FORUM

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, several days ago I was in Cincinnati to deliver an address. While there I was called upon by a delegation of mothers who were greatly interested in keeping this country out of war, thereby sparing their sons. That group of women, known as the Mothers of Sons Forum, has issued a very interesting bulletin to other mothers in Cincinnati. In part, it says:

We are a sincere group of American mothers who are organizing to do everything within our power to keep our sons from fighting in foreign trenches and being sacrificed on foreign soil.

As a part and portion of my remarks at this time I ask that the entire letter be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Women of America:

We wish to invite you to join with the mothers of potential soldiers in our Mothers of Sons Forum.

The Mothers of Sons Forum was born from an original group of 10 mothers. We have grown in number since then and are forming groups throughout the city. It is our aim not only to become city-wide but State-wide and Nation-wide. We have received letters from mothers throughout the country who are interested in our efforts and who wish to organize.

We are a sincere group of American mothers who are organizing to do everything within our power to keep our sons from fighting in foreign trenches and being sacrificed on foreign soil. We believe that war can be abolished and believe that the women of the world are challenged to do it. We appeal to all mothers to rise up to their God-given duties—the protection of life—and demand and insist that the sacrifice of human life as a method of settling international disputes must cease. For if the present devastating warfare continues, there will not be enough of civilization left to make these ideas needed.

We uphold the Monroe Doctrine and pledge our loyalty to our country. We are strictly neutral in our feelings toward the warring nations. We stand for no "ism" but Americanism. We are nonsectarian, nonpolitical, and nondenominational. All mothers are welcome: Few can do nothing, but united we can and will keep our sons out of war. The mothers are concentrating on one thing and one thing only—the outlawing of war—and with the help of God we shall succeed.

Our meetings are held on the first and third Monday of each month in the Price Hill Library, Warsaw Avenue, and the Hyde Park Library, Erie and Michigan Avenues, at 8 p. m. You may obtain any other desired information by writing to Mrs. G. A. Murphy, 4757 Highridge Avenue, Price Hill, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Yours for a speedy and lasting peace,

THE MOTHERS OF SONS FORUM.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

TRADE AGREEMENTS AND SUGAR

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon, after I had suspended for the day, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] took the floor and called the attention of the Senate to a supplementary trade agreement which has been entered into by the Department of State with the Republic of Cuba. This agreement is of such a nature that it seems to me every Senator in this body is driven to consider whether the interests of his State are as open to destruction under this Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act as this supplementary trade agreement demonstrates the interests of all the sugar-producing States of the United States are open to destruction.

Yesterday, when I was engaging in a colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the majority floor leader, I contended that there would be great doubt as to how the words "existing duties" contained in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act should be construed. Every single defense which has been made in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act upon this floor has referred—now, mark my words, Senators—to the limitation which is contained in that act by which modifications may be made within the range of 50 percent up or down as the standard which it is claimed makes the delegation valid. It is acknowledged by the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, it is acknowledged by the distinguished floor leader, it is acknowledged by every supporter of the joint resolution, that there can be no delegation of legislative power unless there is an understandable, intelligible principle to guide the discretion of the President when he acts; and when we ask the supporters of the bill to point out what this intelligible standard is, they say, "The President cannot change the duties more than 50 percent up or 50 percent down."

The tariff upon Cuban sugar in June 1934, when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was under consideration, was $2 per hundred pounds—the existing duty. What is it now? Ninety cents. Where is the 50-percent limitation? And I say to Senators upon this floor who represent the sugar-producing States of the Union, what answer can we give to our constituents who are interested in the production of beets when that message is carried to them—that under cover of this authority, this delegation limited by 50 percent, the tariff upon Cuban sugar has been reduced from $2 to 90 cents?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is it the Senator's contention that this action on the part of the administration in reducing the tariff from $2 to 90 cents is unlawful?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me read the act.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is it not a fact that the duty on Cuban sugar is $1.50 instead of $2?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; the duty now is 90 cents. The duty in June 1934 when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was passed was $2.

Mr. ELLENDER rose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator listen for just a moment? Let me read the law. I am now reading the law dated June 12, 1934:

> No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty * * *.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that the duty on sugar was $2 less the 20-percent differential?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, it was $2.50 less the 20-percent differential.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would still bring it within the law. The 20-percent reduction would bring the 90 cents within the 50-percent change.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am only seeking information. As I understand, the old Cuban duty was $2.20 a hundred.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the facts were that the general duty was $2.50, with a 20-percent preferential to Cuba; so the Cuban duty was $2.

Mr. TYDINGS. Twenty cents, or 20 percent?

Mr. ADAMS. Twenty cents.

Mr. TYDINGS. So the Senator's contention is that the present duty on Cuban sugar without any trade agreement is $2 a hundred?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Not now; no.

Mr. TYDINGS. I say, without any trade agreement?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; because the flexible-tariff provision of the Smoot-Hawley Act was used to reduce the tariff from $2 to $1.50.

Mr. TYDINGS. That was before the trade agreements were negotiated?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. My understanding is that that was afterward. The change was made about the time the Reciprocal Trade Act was passed. Of course, if it was before, the argument would not hold mathematically, for 90 cents, though more than 50 percent below $2, is not 50 percent below $1.50.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is the reason why I was asking the Senator whether or not the State Department had reduced a duty more than 50 percent. The only way in which we could ascertain that fact would be by learning what the duty was at the time the negotiations were promulgated between the two governments.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct. I am seeking to have that date fixed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Just for the sake of keeping the RECORD straight, let me say that I am advised by authority which I think is very accurate that the duty was reduced to $1.50 before the negotiations. I have not looked up the matter; but the clerk, who has looked it up, advises me that that is the fact.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am having it looked up and I shall advise the Senate as soon as I am informed. The important phase of this matter is to be found not only in the point to which I have just alluded, but also in the fact that these modifications, if we are to judge by the present instance, are made without notice to the interests or the States affected.

I hold in my hand a letter which I wrote to the Secretary of State——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to yield further, because I am interested in following his argument, and it will help me if I can get the facts straight. I take it that the Senator contends that if there is a proper limitation, a top and bottom, so to speak, within which the executive branch of the Government can act, Congress may delegate to the executive branch its authority within the limitations it itself fixes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no; I deny that.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator denies that?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I deny that a limitation is a standard. A limitation is not a rule; a limitation is just a limitation, and nothing else. A limitation is not an intelligible principle to guide the Executive in the exercise of a legislative function.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thought the Senator was contending that there was no top and bottom to the proposition.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator misunderstood me. I am sure I do not get his point at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly there is no longer any discussion or debate that the administration did not exceed the 50-percent limit in the reduction in the sugar duty.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It depends on the date upon which the reduction was made from $2 to $1.50. What was the existing duty on June 12, 1934? That is the question. If the existing duty on June 12, 1934, was $1.50, if the flexible-tariff provision had been exercised prior to that date, then, of course, a 90-cent tariff would be mathematically within the limitation, but if, as was my impression—I may have been in error—the flexible-tariff reduction was not made until after the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was passed, the limitation has been exceeded.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am advised that the reduction to $1.50 was in effect at the time designated by the Senator, and if that is so, the administration has not, whether or not we agree with the policy, violated the law.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In that event the limitation has technically not been disregarded. I acknowledge that.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is the point I desired to explain to the Senator. At the time the rate, insofar as Cuba was concerned, was actually fixed at $1.50, the world rate was $2, so there was no violation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. My impression was that the change was not made until after June 12. As I stated to the Senator from Maryland, if it was made prior to that time, then, of course, the discrepancy vanishes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was out of the Chamber part of the time while the Senator was speaking, though I have been here most of the time, and he may have already referred to the matter I have in mind, but if it would not interrupt the Senator too much, I should appreciate his telling us how far Congress may go, in delegating legislative authority to a department of the executive branch of the Government without, in his judgment, violating or setting at naught its legislative prerogative.

MODIFICATIONS OF RATES WITHOUT HEARINGS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to discuss that phase of the matter. In the meantime, however, in order to get the sugar problem behind us, I desire to call the attention of Senators to the fact that once the jurisdiction of the State Department has attached, it undertakes to retain that jurisdiction without any additional hearings of those who are interested in the action to be taken. An agreement made under the first grant is modified without hearings under the extension.

When the reciprocal-trade agreement with Cuba was about to be undertaken, notice was given and all who were interested were permitted to come before the Committee on Reciprocity Information, that committee of—shall I say, clerical sphinxes—who sit in a large hearing chamber while Members of the Senate and of the House, elected to represent their constituents, come and make their statements and are politely bowed out when they have concluded without knowing what, if any, action is to be taken, or what, if any, weight is to be given to their representations, without knowing whether or not the facts and arguments which they have presented will ever go beyond the circle of the membership of that committee.

A hearing was held for the consideration of the sugar tariff, the rate was reduced, and in September 1939, when the quotas were lifted by order of the President, the tariff upon Cuban sugar automatically was restored to $1.50, and the Secretary of State then negotiated another agreement with the Republic of Cuba for the purpose of cutting the rate down to 90 cents.

I protested against that upon the ground that a new notice had to be given and that a new hearing should be held, because the original action was taken under one set of conditions back in 1934 or 1935, and a new set of conditions had arisen 4 years later. Then, without any additional hearing, or the submission of any additional facts, the State Department undertook to cut the rate to 90 cents. It was reported on good authority that it was intended to reduce the rate even further to 75 cents.

What was the theory under which we were acting? The tariff upon Cuban sugar had been raised to $2.20; the differential of 20 cents was in effect. The purpose of that tariff was to keep Cuban sugar out of competition with beet and cane sugar raised in continental United States. Then, exercising the flexible tariff power, after the Tariff Commission had determined the difference between the cost of production in Cuba and in the United States, the President thereupon issued a proclamation authorized by the Smoot-Hawley tariff law reducing the tariff to $1.50. In the agreement it was reduced to 90 cents, in consideration of the fact that a quota had been imposed. The argument was this: "We no longer need the tariff to keep the sugar out. We now have a quota."

The reason for writing into the reciprocal-trade agreement the provision that if the quota were lifted the tariff should go back to $1.50 was that the sugar-producing States of Louisiana and Florida, as well as the beet-growing States, should be protected by a tariff of $1.50 from a flood of Cuban sugar, the flood which in the years before had utterly destroyed the market for our producers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Is it not true that, as a matter of fact, by the agreement of December 18, 1939, the Secretary of State has amended the Sugar Act of 1937?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. President, I wrote a letter to the Secretary of State on September 23 last in which I made reference to this condition. The matter is of such importance that I ask that that letter, the Secretary's reply thereto, and my response to him, may be read from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

EXCHANGE OF LETTERS ON CUBAN AGREEMENT

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., September 23, 1939.

Hon. CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SECRETARY HULL: That the Government of the United States should take every proper precaution to protect the people of the United States from any outbreak of profiteering that might be brought on as a result of the present international situation is a proposition with which there can be no disagreement. To this objective I personally give wholehearted and complete support. It is, however, equally axiomatic that no final action should be taken by the Government except after full consideration and after an opportunity to be heard has been extended to every interest that might be affected.

I write to express the hope that if the Department of State is contemplating the recommendation to the President of any further executive action dealing with the marketing or importation of sugar into the United States, the producers of sugar, and particularly the producers of sugar beets and sugarcane in the United States, shall be heard before any action is taken.

I venture to make this suggestion because of persistent reports which have come to me that the State Department contemplates urging upon the President the proclamation under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of a reduction in the tariff upon Cuban sugar, the quotas of which, imposed by the Sugar Act of 1937, were removed by proclamation of the President on September 11 of this year.

I am advised that the removal of the quotas which, under the existing trade agreement with Cuba, was automatically accompanied by a restoration of the former duty of $1.50 per 100 pounds came as a surprise to the Cuban sugar interests and to the Cuban Government and that the State Department is desirous of making some gesture of reassurance to the Cuban Government and the Cuban sugar interests. It is obvious, I think, that it would be quite as unjust to the American producers of sugar beets and sugarcane to take or to recommend, without notice to them, an action that might grievously affect their interests. I have no doubt that the State Department would not undertake so serious a course without first calling upon the spokesmen of American producers at least to advance their opinions, but lest it should be supposed that this opportunity has already been extended because of the hearings which were held by the Committee for Reciprocity Information pursuant to the public notice of November 30, 1938, I venture to call your attention to the fact that that notice cannot in any sense be regarded as sufficient under the meaning of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

When the notice of November 30, 1938, was issued the amount of sugar which could be imported into the United States from Cuba was definitely fixed by the quota provision of the Sugar Act of 1937. The tariff upon Cuban sugar at that time was 90 cents per 100 pounds. This Cuban sugar tariff in 1934 was $2 per 100 pounds, but in that year was reduced to $1.50 per 100 pounds under the provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act after the United States Tariff Commission had reported to the President that it cost $1.50 per 100 pounds less to produce sugar in Cuba than in the United States.

The order reducing the tariff from $2 to $1.50 was intended to equalize the cost of production between the two countries.

Later, when the existing reciprocal-trade agreement between Cuba and the United States was negotiated, an additional concession of 60 cents per 100 pounds was granted to the producers of Cuban sugar in consideration of the quota limitation contained in the original sugar controlling act and recognized by the trade agreement. It was then provided in the agreement that if for any reason the quota provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937 should become inoperative, the duty in effect upon the date of the agreement should be restored.

It is therefore clear that at the time the hearings were held by the Committee for Reciprocity Information pursuant to the public notice of November 30, 1938, the question was whether with the quota provided in the Sugar Act there should be a reduction of the tariff below 90 cents. The question now is whether, with no quota whatever upon Cuban importations, the tariff should be reduced below $1.50. The issues, therefore, are wholly different and the evidence which was presented to the Committee for Reciprocity Information on January 3, 1939, under the conditions then existing is wholly insufficient now and cannot be controlling in the decision of any present issue.

Section 4 of the Trade Agreements Act provides, as you know, that before any foreign trade agreement is concluded "reasonable" public notice shall be given "in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President or to such agency as the President may designate." Moreover, this section provides that "before concluding such an agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate."

There can be no disagreement therefore that the intent and purpose of the act was to give any interested person a full and free opportunity to discuss the specific conditions under which a contemplated change of tariff duties or import restrictions should be made. The notice of November 30, 1938, was issued while the world was at peace. Europe is now involved in a war, and I think there can be no reasonable contention that in these circumstances any proper action may be taken under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act by virtue of the public notice heretofore issued.

Moreover, it may be proper to point out that the state of war in Europe which now exists has given to the Cuban interests a market advantage which those interests did not have on January 5, 1939. One-third of the Cuban crop is sold in the world market over which the Government of the United States can exercise no control. This world market which has been rising as a result of the present conditions cannot be as beneficial to the American producer as to the Cuban producer, and it seems to me therefore very clear that the careful balance effected by the Sugar Act of 1937 should not be disturbed for the benefit of Cuban sugar interests unless American sugar interests are first invited to state their case.

When the American consumer of sugar was wholly dependent upon foreign sources of supply the price of sugar was many times higher than it can by any possibility go under the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937. The best interests of the American consumer are conserved by a safe and certain domestic supply the price of which may be controlled by action such as that taken by the President in his proclamation of September 11, 1939, an order which was made possible by the Sugar Act of 1937. The dangers to the American consumer that would be involved in any indiscriminate action to the disadvantage of the American producers of sugar beets and sugarcane are so apparent that I am sure you will be persuaded before any action is taken to follow the suggestion made most respectfully in this letter that representatives of the American producers shall first be given an opportunity to express themselves before any recommendation is made.

Very sincerely yours,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 29, 1939.

The Honorable JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: I have received and read with much interest your letter of September 23, concerning the sugar situation and particularly the position of Cuban sugar since the suspension of the sugar-marketing quotas by the President's proclamation of September 11, 1939.

With respect to the specific question of the duty on Cuban sugar, I may say that there are no plans for immediate action in this regard. It would, however, be appropriate for those who are interested in any aspect of the sugar problem, and who may feel that we are not fully informed as to their views in the existing situation bearing on the question of the duty on Cuban sugar, to let us have any additional information or views with which they may wish to supplement the information and views presented in briefs and oral hearings to the Committee for Reciprocity Information last January. The procedure followed under the Trade Agreements Act is broad and flexible with a view to giving American interests every reasonable and practicable opportunity to make their views known. The Committee for Reciprocity Information stands ready at all times to receive such views, whether in writing or, when appropriate and necessary, by means of informal oral conferences.

Thus, if your constituents have any further information or views they may wish to submit as to action which they feel ought or ought not to be taken, they are invited to submit these views now to the Committee for Reciprocity Information and in passing this information on to them you may assure them that any expression of views that they may thus submit will receive every appropriate consideration.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1939.

Hon. CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SECRETARY HULL: Let me acknowledge your letter of September 29, in response to mine of September 23, with respect to the tariff on Cuban sugar. I note with satisfaction your statement that there are no plans for immediate action with respect to the specific question of the duty on Cuban sugar. I also note your statement that "it would be appropriate for those who are interested in any aspect of the sugar problem to submit any additional information or views with which they may wish to supplement the material submitted to the Committee for Reciprocity Information last January." You also undertake, through me, to invite my constituents to submit such views now to the committee.

I am sure you will understand my feeling that any notice from me to my constituents would not satisfy the provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and that it would not be at all adequate for the protection of growers of sugar beets and sugarcane in other States nor for the protection of other elements of the sugar industry. In my opinion, there is only one way for such notice to be given and that is formally by the State Department in the manner prescribed by the law and the regulations.

As indicated in my letter of September 23, a notice issued by the State Department of the negotiation of a supplemental trade agreement with Cuba at a time when the Cuban duty was 90 cents and the quota was approximately 1,900,000 tons is ineffective now that the duty is $1.50 and the quota has been lifted. The suspension of the quota and the reversion of the duty to $1.50 is of such recent occurrence that its effect cannot now be measured and representations made to the State Department in the wholly informal manner which you suggest would not, in my opinion, be a proper protection to those who are interested in the preservation of the American sugar industry.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the response to my inquiry has been received, and I find that the reduction under the flexible-tariff provision was made on June 8, 4 days before the reciprocal-trade agreement went into effect. So technically we have a compliance with the 50-percent limitation. However, it may be pointed out that both these reductions are made under the same law, because the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is an amendment of the Tariff Act of 1930; so that the Cuban tariff, which on June 7, 5 days before the Tariff Act was amended by the reciprocity provision, was $2, was reduced the next day to $1.50, and then under the amendment of June 12, was reduced again to 90 cents.

DEGENERATION OF DEMOCRATIC PROCESS

Mr. President, referring briefly to the argument I was making yesterday, I desire to point out that I was discussing the steady process by which the Congress has surrendered to the Executive more and more of its legislative power. Beginning in 1890 we passed the McKinley Tariff Act, which authorized the President to find a certain fact with respect to five or six commodities; and upon finding the fact of discrimination, to put into effect by proclamation certain specified duties fixed in the law. The Supreme Court, in the case of Field against Clark, upheld that grant as a proper legislative act. It denied that it was any delegation of legislative power, because, it said, the law left nothing to the discretion of the President.

Following that, in 1897, there was another tariff act, the Dingley Act, in which was written a provision calling for reciprocal-trade agreements; but the Congress in 1897 recognized that such agreements were in fact treaties, and so wrote into section 4 of that law the distinct provision, first, that they should be ratified by the Senate, and second, that they should be approved by a legislative enactment of both Houses of the Congress.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not he thinks the latter action was necessary. If Congress, recognizing that these were treaties, treated them as such, was legislative action by the Congress itself necessary?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is my personal opinion that it was not necessary, but it was exceedingly wise, because it was a recognition by Congress that two constitutional provisions were involved—first, the treaty-making power, and second, the revenue-raising power. Legally and constitutionally a treaty is of equal dignity with a law. Therefore, if a foreign agreement fixing customs duties were entered into by the President and ratified by the Senate, in my opinion it would satisfy the Constitution, just as in my opinion, if the Executive should enter into a trade agreement with a foreign country in which he dealt solely with customs duties, the Constitution would be satisfied if the agreement were approved by an act of Congress.

What I was seeking briefly to summarize was the historic development of the transfer of the revenue-raising power to the Executive. The act of 1897 followed by several years the decision in Field against Clark and was, therefore, a declaration by Congress that Field against Clark did not sustain a grant of power to enter into reciprocal-trade agreements without ratification by the Senate and approval by Congress.

However, in 1922, when a Republican Senate and a Republican House were endeavoring once more to extend the power of the Executive by giving him authority, under what is known as the flexible-tariff clause, to move rates up and down, Field against Clark was cited as supporting that policy, though clearly it had not been so regarded in 1897, and though clearly, as has been well pointed out on the floor by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Supreme Court itself in that case declared that nothing was left to the discretion of the Executive. However, after the Fordney-McCumber Act had been passed and the flexible-tariff provision had been enacted, the act was challenged in the courts, and then came the Hampton case, to which reference has been made. In the Hampton case the grant of power in the Fordney-McCumber law was sustained upon the ground that an intelligible standard had been written into the law; namely, the standard of the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

We are now using those two cases and the preceding laws as precedents for a grant which goes far beyond anything that was ever before contemplated. Now, instead of a grant to change tariffs within a limitation of 20 percent according to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, we have a grant to change customs duties within 50 percent, without any standard, and with only a limitation. Thus I say that step by step the revenue-raising power has been granted by Congress to the Executive. What is the next step? Only imagination can discern.

POINTS THAT SEEM BEYOND DISPUTE

There are several points which seem to me to be beyond dispute. Indeed, they are not denied by any person who attempts to defend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

First. The President, under the Constitution, may not make a treaty without the consent of the Senate. Nobody will gainsay that statement.

Second. The President may not make a tariff law without the affirmative approval of Congress. Nobody will deny that.

Third. The President may make an Executive agreement without the consent of the Senate, or without the consent of the Congress; but, as has been pointed cut uniformly by the courts, an Executive agreement is of lesser dignity than a treaty. In the Altman case it was the express declaration of the court that an Executive agreement does not reach the dignity of a treaty. Of course, it does not reach the dignity of a treaty, because an Executive agreement is a pact that does not generally affect the public welfare, as Justice Taney so clearly pointed out.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator made the point that an Executive agreement such as he cited, which has been upheld by the Supreme Court as being constitutional, is only a temporary arrangement. Has the Senator discussed the trade-agreements program from the angle of being only a 3-year program; and does the Senator think that the trade agreements are temporary agreements or not, in line with what the Court said in the decision cited?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. They are not such within the statement of the Court. I refer the Senator to the quotation from Justice Taney, which he will find at the close of my testimony before the Finance Committee, which clearly points out the difference between Executive agreements and treaties.

The Constitution says that treaties and laws are the supreme law of the land. It is acknowledged that an Executive agreement is neither a treaty nor a law. Of course, it is true that the President has the right to make an Executive agreement without ratification by the Senate or without the passage of an act of Congress; but now we are called upon to argue that because the President has the right to make Executive agreements, he may make such agreements without ratification, and without approval and thus swallow up the treaty-making power protected by the Constitution, and also the revenue-raising power, likewise protected by the Constitution. In other words, we are asked to believe that the lesser is of greater force than the superior. Treaties and laws must give way before agreements which are beneath the dignity of those acts of Government which constitute the supreme law of the land.

Because the President must necessarily have power in the foreign field to make agreements which do not reach the dignity of either treaties or laws, are we now to argue that the treaty-making power and the revenue-raising power may be swallowed up in Executive agreements? To answer that in the affirmative, Mr. President, is to acknowledge that the democratic processes of this Government, as established by the Constitution, are being undermined.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is not the Senator's statement a little too broad? The Senator stated that the President of the United States may make an Executive agreement. Obviously there are certain fields within which Executive agreements may be made by the President without transcending constitutional limitations, but it seems to me it would be a little too broad a statement to announce that the President would have the authority to make an agreement without limitation or restriction. He might make an agreement affecting revenue or tariffs, which would not be valid because it would not be within the authority which he possesses under the broad interpretation of the authority of the Executive as announced by Mr. Justice Sutherland in the case in which he wrote the opinion. Let me say, not by way of criticism of the Supreme Court or of my dear friend Mr. Justice Sutherland, that I think he went a little too far in conceding authority to the executive department under the theory that it possesses inherent powers outside of those delegated under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is quite right. What I meant to say, of course, was that an Executive agreement can be made without ratification by the Senate. Frequently congressional authority is given for such an agreement.

THE HISTORIC POSITION OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. President, it was not my intention to occupy the floor at any great length this morning, and I shall not speak very much longer, but I do wish to call to the attention of the Members of this body the fundamental and primary fact that the position which I take upon this floor today is the historic position of the Democratic Party. So far as my knowledge goes, there has never been a time in all the history of this great political organization when it has not championed the retention by the people of the largest possible amount of initial legislative power. During the long process of development, whereby, beginning in 1890 and down to 1934, the revenue-making power has been in greater and greater degree steadily transferred to the Executive, the spokesmen of the Democratic Party, until this reciprocal-trade agreement was first proposed in this administration, have without exception opposed the surrender of the power of the people's representatives in Congress to fix customs duties.

There never has been a time when its spokesmen upon the floor of the Senate and its spokesmen in the House of Representatives have not resisted grants of the taxing power, regardless of the pretext or of the ground on which the attempt was made. Always our spokesmen, every great Democratic leader in Congress, from the great statesmen of 1890 down to the passage of the Fordney-McCumber Act has, in the strongest and most eloquent terms, insisted that such a grant of power as contained in this measure is in violation of the Constitution.

Because, as a Democrat, I have been jealous of the right of the elected representatives of the people in Congress to know what disposition is to be made of their most vital interests as involved in the tariff, I have, from the beginning, urged that these trade agreements be submitted to Congress. I proposed such an amendment in 1934 and again in 1937. I could not, without the complete surrender of fundamental political conviction, do otherwise now.

This is a matter of fundamental democratic principle. It is not affected by the fact that the President, today, happens to be a member of my party, that the Secretary of State likewise happens to be a member of my party, and that I have the highest personal admiration and respect for them both. I do not hesitate to say that Mr. Roosevelt ranks among our greatest Presidents and that Secretary Cordell Hull has been one of the greatest of our Secretaries of State. I admire Mr. Hull personally, and honor him as a great and noble man, but I cannot help recalling, as the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] so well pointed out yesterday, that when Secretary Hull was a Representative from the State of Tennessee, upon the floor of the House of Representatives, he there took exactly the same position I am taking here today. Not only that, but one of the greatest Senators who ever trod this floor, Senator Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, than whom there never has been a more distinguished, able, and courageous Democrat, likewise made the argument against the grant of legislative power to the Executive, which I am making today. A man whose reputation had been built up through many years of service in this body, whose progressive tendencies were so well known, whose ability as a constitutional lawyer, and as a champion of the people was so well recognized from one end of the country to the other that he was chosen by Franklin D. Roosevelt to become the adviser of the New Deal in the first Cabinet, Thomas J. Walsh was persuaded to resign his position in this body in order to become Attorney General and great, indeed, was the loss to the people of America, when death stilled his tongue.

THE MEASURE OF DELEGATED POWER

Much has been said here about the measure of delegated power. I want to ask Senators, particularly Democratic Senators, to bear with me while I read just a few paragraphs from a speech delivered in the Senate in August 1922, by Thomas J. Walsh, when he was discussing the question of what constitutes a proper and legitimate delegation of legislative power to any agency. The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Mississippi have been asking what constitutes a proper delegation. In the course of the debate yesterday, the majority leader cited the Interstate Commerce Act and asked if that did not constitute a precedent which would justify such a delegation of power to the Executive as is contained in the act now sought to be extended. That question was raised when the Fordney-McCumber Act was under consideration. I am glad to note that the Senator from Kentucky is now in the Chamber, because I want him particularly to listen to the answer given in the words of Senator Thomas J. Walsh.

All the authorities agree—

Said Senator Walsh—

that wherever power of this kind is delegated to an administrative officer it is subject to review by the courts, in order to determine whether the law has been followed and complied with or not, and if provision is not made, or provision does not exist, for such a review in the courts the act cannot be sustained.

That principle has been recognized in all of our legislation. The Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to fix railroad rates, and to do many other things in connection with the operation of railroads and common carriers generally; but every order it makes is subject to review in the courts, as provided in the act.

In exactly the same way, when we authorized the Federal Trade Commission to issue an order commanding any person complained of to desist from practices in trade alleged to be unfair, an opportunity was given to review in the courts the decision thus made by it, that it might be set aside if the facts did not justify the order that was made.

So we gave a power of review in the case of the "packer" legislation. It becomes necessary, therefore, every time we thus delegate power to fix rates of any kind, or to make any rule or order affecting the rights of a citizen, to give him an opportunity to go into the courts to review any action taken under the power granted and to have it annulled if it shall be oppressive in any way or contrary to the rule laid down by the statute.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that crystal-clear statement from the mind of one of the greatest constitutional lawyers this country ever produced leaves no room for argument in the immediate case, because in the act sought to be extended there is no possibility to review.

What is the test of a proper delegation of power as laid down by the decisions and by the text writers? The test is a very simple one, which defines the distinction between the legislator and the administrator. To the legislator, because he is a representative of the sovereign people and their constitutional spokesman, is committed the responsibility and the duty of exercising discretion and judgment, of considering all the facts and of determining what the law shall be. To the legislator is given the power to make the law; and when that law is made, it must be executed by the administrator, it must be observed by the citizen, and it must be upheld by the courts.

To the administrator, upon the other hand, is committed a distinctly lesser power. It is his duty, not to make the law but to execute the law which has already been made for him. He acts at his peril if he exceeds the provisons of the law. He may be restrained by the courts, which may release the citizen from obedience to his orders. But, observe that there is no appeal to the courts from the law save upon the ground that it is unconstitutional; and an unconstitutional law is no law at all.

So here we have a clear distinction between the law-making power and the law-enforcing power. When Congress delegates, in this modern, complicated civilization of ours, to an executive agency the power to execute its policy, to make rules and regulations, to fix rates, or to exercise any other power, all such acts are reviewable by the courts.

Are the rates excessive?

Were the regulations within the scope of the authority?

Was the action of the executive an arbitrary action?

These and many other questions the citizen may ask of the court; and the court must answer; and when the court answers the administrator must heed and the citizen has his protection; because, Mr. President, he appeals to the court for the enforcement of the law as made by the people's representatives from the act of the executive who carries it out.

But what have we here? What have we in this act which was brought into this body in 1934? We have the express denial of review by the courts. Into this bill now said to be a law, in section 2, the second sentence thereof, was written this sentence:

The provisions of sections 336 and 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall not apply to any article with respect to the importation of which into the United States a foreign trade agreement has been concluded pursuant to this act.

Section 516 (b) was the section in the Tariff Act of 1930 which preserved to producers and manufacturers the right of court review. The Trade Agreements Act takes it away; and when the act took away that right of review it struck down the entire difference between a proper and an improper and unconstitutional delegation of authority.

THE WARNING OF SENATOR WALSH

Mr. President, yesterday I remarked upon this floor that conditions in the world clearly point to the fact that the democratic system of government is under attack. We know that the United States of America is almost the only great nation in which popular government still remains. Are we, under the excuse of complexity of our problems; are we, because of difficulty of enforcement, to surrender the power and responsibility of the legislative arm of this Government to make the law in a democratic way?

Again, Mr. President, I call the attention of Senators to the language of Thomas J. Walsh, than whom there is not now nor ever was a more authoritative spokesman for the Democratic Party or for the sovereign people. He was talking about the delegation to the Executive in the Fordney-McCumber Act:

Whatever doubt may be entertained by anyone concerning the constitutionality of the amendments under consideration, no doubt ought to exist in the mind of anyone, in my judgment, as to their unwisdom. Their stoutest defenders will probably disclaim any attachment whatever to the principle they represent as a feature of a permanent tariff policy; indeed, they hasten to convey the assurance that, were it not for the chaotic business conditions which prevail throughout the world and the instability of foreign exchange, they could not be induced to embrace it or even to tolerate it. Some apology, Mr. President, is certainly in order for such an astounding delegation of the functions of Congress to the Executive, vesting him with an authority no constitutional monarch may exercise, in character quite like that for the assumption of which kings have been brought to the block.

No emergency, however grave, can justify the surrender into the hands of the President of the taxing power intrusted by the people to their representatives in Congress, no matter how profound may be his statesmanship or how exalted may be the character of the man who for a brief period may be elevated to that high office. If this encroachment upon the liberties of the people is either sanctioned or condoned, there is no man wise enough nor prescient enough to foresee the ultimate consequences.

It is said that an exigency exists demanding this departure from the settled policy of our Government. Our skies are never wholly clear; emergencies continually confront us, and when they are wanting an ambitious President or an indolent or subservient Congress will have no difficulty whatever in conjuring up such.

Mr. President, can any Democrat listen to those words and have any doubt remaining in his mind that this Congress should not permit itself to be classified with those Congresses, the possibility of which Thomas J. Walsh foresaw, which, because of indolence or subservience, would be willing to surrender the power given to the Federal Legislature under the Constitution to protect the people by making the people's laws?

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6724) to provide for the prompt deportation of aliens engaging in espionage or sabotage, alien criminals, and other undesirable aliens.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 51), in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the time for making the report of the Joint Committee on Forestry (established pursuant to S. Con. Res. 31, 75th Cong.) is hereby extended to April 1, 1941, and any amounts available for the expenses of such committee shall be available for expenditure until such date.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCARRAN in the chair). Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. In view of the remarks made yesterday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] and those made this morning by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] with reference to the sugar agreements with Cuba, in which they quoted the Secretary of State of the United States, I may say that I have just received a letter from the Secretary of State apropos this matter, which I desire to have inserted in the RECORD at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 27, 1940.

The Honorable PAT HARRISON,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: My attention has been called to the remarks of Senator JOHNSON of Colorado in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the subject of sugar and the Cuban trade agreement.

The supplementary agreement concluded with Cuba on December 18, 1939, to which Senator JOHNSON referred, in effect restored the provisions relating to sugar of the trade agreement concluded in 1934, with relatively little change. Under the amended agreement the restored rate of 90 cents remains contingent upon a system of sugar-quota limitations such as is provided in the Sugar Act of 1937. Thus the substance of the protection of American producers, inherent in the linking of the tariff concession with the domestic-sugar program, is maintained.

The principal change made by the supplementary agreement provides a safeguard for the American consuming public in the event of a temporary suspension of the sugar-quota restrictions in consequence of an emergency situation such as occurred last September.

It will be recalled that, following the outbreak of the European war in September, sugar prices increased very rapidly and a fear arose on the part of consumers of a possible shortage in sugar supplies. The price of refined sugar rose within a few days from about 4.30 cents per pound to 5.60 cents. On September 11, in consequence of this situation, the President suspended the sugar quotas.

Under the terms of the 1934 agreement with Cuba, however, there resulted an automatic increase in the duty on Cuban sugar from 0.9 cent per pound to 1.5 cents. The effect of this increase was to reduce our imports of Cuban sugar very substantially.

This tariff increase was injurious to our trade with Cuba and placed a substantial burden on an important part of our sugar supplies at the very time when action was taken to make larger supplies available.

In his statement yesterday Senator JOHNSON quoted extracts from my reply of February 7, 1940, to Representative MOUTON. I would like to complete the reference by quoting the final paragraph of that reply.

"As you know, the increase in the duty on Cuban sugar which resulted, under the terms of the sugar note included in the 1934 agreement with Cuba, from the suspension of sugar quotas last September operated to place a substantially increased burden on the importation of Cuban sugar precisely at a time when consumers feared a shortage of sugar and when there had been a large speculative increase in the price of sugar."

With reference to the excise-tax and benefit payments, to which Senator JOHNSON also refers, I may point out that this tax continued to be levied on Cuban sugar, as on other sugar during the period of the quota suspension, and it is my understanding that the benefit payments continued to be made on domestic crops marketed during that period. Cuban producers, of course, do not receive such payments.

I am confident that, in the light of the foregoing explanation, Senator JOHNSON will agree that it was right and equitable that the American consuming public should be protected in the manner indicated, while at the same time the essential interests of domestic-sugar producers remain protected by the continued linking of the tariff reduction on Cuban sugar to the maintenance of legal provision for sugar marketing quota restrictions.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the pending joint resolution to again extend the life of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. The people of my State of Michigan are seriously divided upon the subject. There are those who earnestly believe in the Hull program; there are those who equally earnestly do not believe in it. Therefore I feel that I owe it to myself, to the record, and to my constitutents to indicate plainly why I now asume the position which I take. I never like to leave any misunderstanding regarding my attitudes or my views. My constituents are entitled to know precisely where I stand.

Mr. President, I oppose the pending measure for the following categorical reasons:

First. The trade-agreements law continues to be an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power and discretion to the Chief Executive. It delegates the treaty power, the tariff power, the internal taxing power, a combination of surrenders which could not be more flagrant or more subversive of the American constitutional system.

Second. It delegates to the Executive, in actual practice to a State Department bureaucracy which finally operates in despotic secrecy, the virtual power of life and death over every protected industry, every protected industrial job, and every protected agricultural commodity in the United States. As Secretary Hull himself once said of an infinitely less expansive delegation of the tariff authority, "This is too much power for a bad man to have, or for a good man to want." It is economic dictatorship come to America.

Third. Through its blind attachment to the unconditional most-favored-nation policy, at a time when most of the rest of the world renders only the scantiest lip service to this doctrine of generalized trade equities, it is slowly but surely, if not deliberately, driving the United States to a basis of uncompensated low tariffs which will ultimately wreck us just as surely as too low tariffs heretofore have always been poison to American wage and living and price standards. We cannot preserve American standards—higher than anywhere else on earth—unless differentials between foreign and domestic costs of production are equalized by protective tariff at the customhouse.

Fourth. It is a weak and wholly inadequate instrumentality for serving even the purpose for which it is presumed to be dedicated, namely, the defense and promotion of our foreign trade, because war conditions and prospective post-war-trade competitions involve a multitude of trade weapons which these wishful reciprocal treaties do not and cannot remotely touch. We require a far more realistic and effective foreign-trade program, one which "fights the devil with fire," if I may use the colloquialism, and one which is geared more intimately to foreign-trade obstacles on the one hand and to the necessities of our own domestic economy upon the other. I yield to none in my desire to promote foreign export trade by every legitimate means which do not create more problems than they solve.

Fifth. It is not working, it cannot work, as was hopefully intended, except in favored spots, and the best exhibit to prove that in a nutshell is submitted to us by the United States Department of Commerce, which tells us that in 1933, the last full year before any trade agreements were in operation, 2,384,000 of our people were engaged in the production, distribution, and servicing of goods for export; whereas in 1937, a full year after the treaties were in operation, the people thus employed numbered only 2,400,000. In other words, the increase was little or nothing and purely incidental in respect to the revival of world trade and our share in it.

Sixth. The alternative is not to abandon all pursuit of foreign trade and all defense of our external commerce. The alternative is not to revert to what is rightfully condemned as logrolling, general revisions of the tariff. The alternative is to seek reciprocity which tangibly reciprocates; to provide a concentrated foreign-trade authority which can cope with all the external trade penalties which American export increasingly confronts; to keep our tariffs elastic, through the medium of a ministerial agency which responds to specific congressional criteria, and in constant adjustment to American costs of competitive production.

Mr. President, I shall endeavor to sustain in somewhat greater detail, although still briefly, each of these six points. But before I do so I think I owe it to candor to make it plain that a substantial sector of the constituency which I have the honor to represent disagrees, at the moment, with the position which I assume and assert. For example, a vast majority of the great automotive industry, which largely centers in Michigan, not only enthusiastically applauds this reciprocal trade treaty law but unreservedly recommends the unencumbered passage of the pending joint resolution.

In the negotiation of these trade treaties, the State Department has been consistently considerate of the automotive industry, and unquestionably has been helpful to it in spots. That industry is the key industry in America today, and if we are to proceed under this particular law, it is to the credit of the State Department that it does everything it can to promote the external welfare of this industry.

I owe it to candor—and certainly to a substantial part of my constituency—to further state that many great commercial bodies, like the Detroit Board of Commerce, approve the Hull program and advocate its unlimited continuation. But I ask Senators to contemplate the position in which I thus find myself, and to attribute to me what must be a profoundly deep conviction when I step away from these great sectors of my constituency to agree with those other sectors, principally in the farming area, in the smaller cities, in the protected industries, and in the mining area, who insist that a continuation of this program is to their everlasting hazard.

I disagree with these power industrial interests of my State with the greatest reluctance, but the fact that I disagree I hope proves the deep sincerity with which I cling to the position I have taken ever since this Hull program has appeared in the halls of Congress. I want to save American wage standards in our factories. I want to promote parity prices on our American farms. I want to protect our American advances toward greater social security than has been attempted anywhere else on earth. It cannot be done, Mr. President, if we are leveled off, in any degree, to foreign standards.

Mr. President, I may say at that point in respect to the automotive industry, since it is a matter of great concern, and since it is constantly used as one of the great exhibits to defend the utility of the Hull program, that the testimony of those who spoke for the industry before the Senate Finance Committee, is a substantial answer to their own assertions respecting the value and the importance of the contribution which the Hull program makes to their export prosperity. This is what I mean. They present figures which show that their automotive export trade has increased from $76,000,000 in 1932 to $282,000,000 in 1938, and they invite the inference that that great increase is substantially attributable to the Hull program. But, Mr. President, when you break their figures down you find that they had recovered $250,000,000 of their $282,000,000 before the Hull program was even substantially under way. In other words, the major recovery in export trade, be it the automotive industry whose figures I am particularly quoting, or any other industry—the major recovery in exports is not due to the Hull program. It is due to the recuperation of world consumptive buying power, and no other conclusion can honestly be drawn from the statistics.

I have said that others of my constituents do agree with the position I take. I think every farm organization in Michigan, precisely like every substantial farm organization in the country, has insisted upon at least some sort of additional protection before this law shall be extended, and in all but one instance every other major agricultural organization is insisting, either that the whole program shall be suspended, or that Senate ratification of future treaties shall inject some small degree of representative democracy and democratic protection into this terrifically important trade process.

There are other interests in my State of Michigan that are involved. Mr. President, the Upper Peninsula of my State would be literally on fire against this measure today if the State Department, with a shrewd precaution worthy of practical diplomacy at its best, had not hastened to announce on the threshold of this discussion that it has decided at least for the time being to forego any tampering with the excise tax on copper in connection with the still pending Chilean negotiation. Yes, and the great sections of the agricultural West would be marching against this measure if the State Department on the eve of this issue had not conveniently announced its abandonment of negotiations for an Argentine treaty, which could not have failed to jeopardize our western agricultural interests. These gentlemen may not be logrollers, but at least they are extremely practical in their strategy.

It can be argued that these timely announcements prove that the State Department does not intend to abuse its power, but, Mr. President, that is not enough for me. I do not think any powers should exist which can be abused. I prefer that the chastening and ameliorating influence of congressional review should always and constantly be present to temper the wind to the shorn lamb and to keep the State Department in constant consciousness of the presence of a House and Senate on the hill, when handling any sector of our foreign relations.

There is one other preliminary thing I wish to say. I wish to join in the expression of deep personal respect for the distinguished Secretary of State, for whom this measure is the climax of a consistent life ambition. I consider Cordell Hull one of the great men of his time. He has a purity of character and an integrity of purpose that shines like the noonday sun in a clear, blue sky. He believes in low tariffs. He has always believed in low tariffs. He devoted a distinguished congressional career to the pursuit of low tariffs. He has never deviated in his course. At last he has found a way to get what he wants.

But I happen to be a congenital protectionist. So our paths part. For precisely the same reason that he is basically in favor of this measure I am basically against it. Nonetheless I present him with my respect, and my affection, and my congratulations that, in the language of the street, he has found "there is more than one way to skin a cat." What he could not get in Congress he now gets from Congress.

Mr. President, let me develop without too much detail the fundamental points to which I have adverted, which move me to oppose the pending measure. Even if it were possible to concede a great cash-register advantage to us from the Hull treaties, which I deny, I am unable to accept commercial advantage as an excuse for breaking down the constitutional formula which protects an American interest in free institutions wholly transcending transient profits from trade. Certainly none of us will consciously put a price upon our constitutional fidelities. Yet the pending measure creates, in the fictitious name of commercial profit, a complete emasculation of constitutional warrants and controls.

There are few, if any, Democrats upon this floor who do not violently condemn the elastic provision of previous tariff laws as an indefensible delegation of congressional power and discretion to the President. Yet these "elastic tariffs" which they all condemn put the President within the boundaries of a hard and fast rule that he must not reduce American duties below the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. The Hull law contains no such rule of thumb at all; it contains no effective limitations. There is a vague and general permission which lets the President—that is to say, a committee of State Department bureaucrats—do whatever they please, within a 50-percent range—whatever they think will please, America, according to their economic ideas.

If they happen to think that free trade will benefit America, we forthwith get as much free trade as they can give us. They, the State Department bureaucrats, thus settle a great question in fundamental policy which heretofore has been an undefiled prerogative of the American people to settle for themselves at the polls in the election of a Congress which should act for itself; or, better still, through a scientific tariff control continuously exercised through a foreign-trade board acting within specific statutory limitations.

This thing now being done was not what the Constitution intended. It is not what Secretary Hull himself thought and said the Constitution intended—until he reached his contemporary eminence.

I am now referring to the same exhibit which was presented to the Senate by the able junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], who now occupies the Presiding Officer's chair, in his able and unanswerable address yesterday. It is so important as revealing a fundamental philosophy for which the Secretary of State himself was a flaming devotee and advocate that I must refer to it again.

While Mr. Hull was a Member of the House of Representatives he opposed the "elastic tariff," and, I repeat, the "elastic tariff" was an infinitely minor delegation of power compared to this—he opposed this lesser delegation of power in a speech on May 13, 1929, from which I quote. Mr. Hull is speaking:

> The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible-tariff clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress.

Secretary Hull speaking:

> Not since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of the Government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill.

Secretary Hull still speaking:

> As has been said on a former occasion, "this is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want."

Mr. Hull still speaking:

> This proposal embraces another revolutionary policy—

"Revolutionary policy" is the phrase which the eminent Secretary used to describe this lesser delegation of power a decade ago—

> This proposal embraces another revolutionary policy, which is to abandon the law and the Republican doctrine to the effect that all tariffs should be measured by the difference between production costs here and abroad by adding a number of alternative so-called methods to ascertain what is termed conditions of competition between this and other countries. It is proposed thus to give the President and his Tariff Commission, which, by the way, is virtually taken away from Congress, authority to use what in practical effect will be any sort of basis on which to fix tariff rates.

Mind you, he is complaining against any legislation which delegates tariff-making authority either to the Executive himself or to the State Department, or to the Tariff Commission, which in practical effect permits them to choose "any sort of basis on which to fix tariff rates."

That simply was not so in connection with the thing he was talking about at the time, but it is a complete and accurate definition, word for word, of the delegation of power which the Secretary not only now accepts but urges that he shall have the privilege to continue to accept for 3 more years.

Mr. Hull was later in the Senate. I repeat, he has always been a very consistent man up to this point. Even at this point he is consistent because he is obtaining low tariffs through a back-door method, but he ceases to be consistent with respect to his attitude toward this delegation of power.

This is Mr. Hull speaking in the Senate on May 19, 1932:

> The President goes further and refers to the retention of the flexible-tariff clause. At the time this clause was enacted I called attention in a speech in the House to the significance of this flexible-tariff policy and the effect of the proposed enactment of the present law in the following language—

Whereupon he quotes himself as I have already substantially quoted him. Then Mr. Hull continues:

> Unless and until the executive department can make permanent the policy of the present Tariff Commission law, with its flexible provision, Congress can lay claim to some semblance of its taxing power under the Constitution; but I deny the right of the executive department practically to assume—to arrogate to itself—the chief power of tariff taxation in this country, while it ignores the great lawmaking body charged with that function and duty under the language of the Constitution.

If that is not a literal definition of the thing which the Senate is now asked once more to approve, then I cannot understand the English language.

This is some more from Mr. Hull:

> There is an issue sharply presented as to whether this hand-picked high-tariff commission, under the domination of the President, who at the same time shows an amazing subserviency to the chief tariff beneficiaries of this country, shall be vested with the chief control of tariff making. I am opposed to it, and I believe that the sober second thought of the American people will repudiate this unprecedented and unusual and wholly unjustifiable arrogation of power and authority to the President.

Mr. President, that was excellent doctrine on May 19, 1932, and it is excellent doctrine on March 27, 1940.

Thus, Mr. President, we find that he who insisted only 8 years ago on the unconstitutionality of the elastic tariff—which, remember, was far more limited than the pending reciprocal-tariff powers—is now the earnest sponsor of a continuing proposal which removes Congress still further from its rightful authority in tariff making. It is impossible to compose these violently different points of view. The elastic tariff, which Mr. Hull and most of his colleagues said was unconstitutional, did not permit the President to make a treaty or a commercial agreement with anybody. It did not permit the President to invade the internal-tax structure of the country and change existing internal-tax laws or to tie the hands of Congress against future changes in internal-tax laws. It stopped far short of the enormous Executive prerogatives which the pending joint resolution would validate and extend. It laid down a cost-of-production rule which the Executive could not violate. Yet Mr. Hull said time and again that these lesser elastic tariff powers were the most reprehensible surrender of popular sovereignty "since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation."

The Supreme Court has said that Mr. Hull was wrong in respect to the elastic tariff, because—quoting from the Supreme Court—that law laid down "by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform," and because the law left no discretion upon these questions to the congressional agent.

These elements are wholly lacking in the pending measure. Yea, more, the joint resolution goes infinitely further. It sometimes gives exclusive treaty-making powers to the President, as I have demonstrated with the Colombian exhibit. It gives power to the President over internal taxation, as we find when he reached into the excise taxes on copper, coal, oil, and lumber, although the distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee stood upon the floor of the Senate at the time the law was passed and assured us upon his responsibility that the President would have no such authority to invade the excise taxes to which I have referred.

Mr. President, I oppose such a clearly unconstitutional surrender of legislative responsibility; and I am consoled by the thought that Secretary Hull himself, as recently as 1932, would have given me powerful support in my position. In the light of the record, he could not have done otherwise. In the light of the record, I shall sustain what I believe to be the constitutional position.

One of two things should happen. Either these treaties should come back to the Senate for ratification or the law should be amended to provide specific criteria to prevent the State Department negotiators from ignoring the adequate defense of American costs of production. Better still, we should create a foreign-trade board, which, among other things, shall permanently keep the tariff in nonpolitical adjustment to American costs of production. I have introduced such a bill.

I now leave the constitutional argument to the lawyers. However, there is a phase of it which even a layman can comprehend. Many industries in this country cannot survive without legitimate and adequate tariff protection to equalize our higher wages, costs, and living standards. Many agricultural commodities cannot survive in unequalized competition with foreign agricultural imports. This is a condition, not a theory. But the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act permits a committee of State Department bureaucrats to decide for themselves—in ultimate secrecy—whether protected industries and commodities shall live or die.

They decide for themselves which industry and which commodity shall be traded off in favor of benefits for other more fortunate industries and commodities. They pick the winners, and they pick the losers. If they are omnisciently wise, all is well. If they are wrong, the victims suffer without recourse; and the victims are the people of the United States. If they believe that wisdom dictates a rule that no American activity is entitled to survive unless it is economically able to meet foreign competition without a protective-tariff differential—that view is highly held by some of the administration's chief spokesmen, and has been asserted more than once—if that be their view, then goodbye to many protected industries and farm commodities under the latitude of the pending joint resolution. Goodbye also to American wage standards, and to at least half the American jobs which still remain filled.

This is a discretion, mark you, placed in the hands of a group of appointed officials who have never answered to the electorate for their power or for their acts. It is the most tremendous of all the delegated powers which have transferred us from democracy to government by executive decree.

It is not enough to say that this power has not been and will not be abused. It is not a question of abuse. It is a question of human judgments. Borrowing the language of Mr. Hull upon a previous occasion, it is too much power for a bad man to have, or for a good man to want. It leaves all protected agriculture and all protected industry in a state of constant suspense and uncertainty. It defeats long-range planning and long-range recovery. It makes dependable planning in private enterprise impossible. It makes government the master of American industry and agriculture. Even though it were to produce economic benefits—which I deny, considering the country as a whole—still I confess that I cannot understand how some of our great industries, even though they may themselves be the transient beneficiaries of the system, can upon the one hand demand free enterprise and inveigh against the deadening hand of bureaucracy, while on the other hand they sustain the reciprocal trade-treaty law, which is the deadliest hand of bureaucracy which has yet descended upon American life. The battle for freedom cannot be a battle of any such compromise; and I shall continue to decline the compromise.

Mr. President, I now wish briefly to discuss the double proposition: First, that it is impossible for the United States to operate safely under the so-called unconditional, most-favored-nation policy in a world at war; and second, that the reciprocal formula in the joint resolution is wholly inadequate, if not actually a handicap, in meeting the external trade-controlling devices which dominate the world at war and will inevitably dominate the competitive post-war trade readjustments.

Despite the bravely wishful suggestions of the Under Secretary of State Welles in Paris 2 weeks ago to the contrary, there can be no argument that straight tariffs are now a relatively minor factor in the trade controls with foreign governments. Yes; and even we ourselves have not hesitated to invoke export subsidies and barter agreements upon occasion in complete negation of our own contemporary philosophy. We can scarcely criticize others for kindred realism, but, as realists curselves, in the face of these conditions, we should no longer lean on one poor, broken crutch. It is neither wise nor safe.

Straight tariffs, I repeat, are now a minor factor and will be for many years to come. Instead we face exchange restrictions, exchange allotments, bilateral agreements, quotas, embargoes, barters, special regulations, formation of trade areas, currency blocs, and, the most devastating weapon of all, depreciated currencies. Few of these trade barriers against us are ever conclusively reached by reciprocal-trade treaties. Under the unconditional most-favored-nation policy, which we still faithfully pursue, we generalize all our tariff benefits to others; oh, yes; foreigners get everything; there is no question about that; but we get precious little generalized reciprocal benefits in return under existing conditions. We saunter complacently down a one-way street, and we are about to lose our shirts.

As long ago as 1935, 5 years ago, the very able Assistant Secretary of State, Henry F. Grady, now in charge of the reciprocal-trade treaties at the State Department, said this:

Even more serious than tariffs and trade barriers and far more threatening with respect to the future of world industrial development, is the virtual destruction during the last 4 years of the structure of international prices because—because of the gross discriminations, preferential trading arrangements, and the arbitrary control of trade through import quotas, exchange allocation, and the like.

Because of what? Because of tariffs? Oh, no.

That was back in 1935. The intervening years, despite trade treaties, have not leveled off these obstacles; on the contrary, they mount higher and ever higher.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce says, in its annual report for 1939:

Obstacles to foreign intercourse * * * became perhaps even more numerous and more complex during the past year than in preceding years. * * * Various forms of exchange restrictions imposed by foreign governments have created a problem of obtaining effective payments in dollars quite apart from the ordinary difficulties of securing and holding foreign markets for American products. Not only are restrictions placed upon the free conversion of foreign currencies into dollars, but it may be required also that exchange allotments must be obtained before goods are passed through customs or even before goods are ordered. Imports from the United States are frequently on a different footing from shipments originating in other countries.

Mark that phrase—

Imports from the United States are frequently on a different footing from shipments originating in other countries.

This is the testimony of the Department of Commerce. We are supposed to be trading under the unconditional most-favored-nation theory in dealing with the world and the world is supposed to reciprocate in dealing with us in kind. If they deal with us in kind, they treat us as they treat others. What does the Department of Commerce say about the way they treat us. This is what the Department of Commerce says:

Imports from the United States are frequently on a different footing from shipments originating in other countries, notably in instances in which clearing and compensation agreements are in effect or in which bilateral trade results in an excess of exports from this country; and special regulations are sometimes applied to the importation of particular commodities. Transfers of dividends, profits, royalties, and other payments not directly related to trade in goods are often subject to rigid controls. Moreover, the operations of American-owned enterprise in certain foreign countries, involving investments of large propositions, have been placed under severe disabilities.

This is still the Department of Commerce discussing the realities of the obstacles to our export trade, realities that utterly laugh at any conclusive relief that can come from reciprocal-trade treaties:

In the case of barriers to trade in goods there has been increasing resort to measures beyond the familiar tariff duties. For example, quota systems which stipulate maximum quantities of specified commodities which may be imported from all countries, have become common. * * * The situation has been rendered the more confusing during recent times by political dislocations in central Europe and Asia and by the formation of trade areas and currency blocs to which access from outside areas is completely or partially closed by the use of extraordinary control devices.

That is what we confront, "extraordinary control devices" on every hand all around the globe. Yet we blandly, naively extend the "unconditional most-favored nation" privilege to the world, and we usually get nothing back from it except a very casual and occasional general tariff benefit. There are some exceptions but not many.

In the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee, Secretary Wallace very frankly said—page 67:

I would say exchange controls and quotas are probably more significant than tariffs.

Of course they are. Yet the Trade Agreements Act, which is supposed to be the alpha and omega of our export salvation, deals almost solely with tariffs, and tariffs are utterly a minor factor in the problem which we confront in this war-torn world and in the inevitably highly competitive circumstances which will control the post-war readjustment.

Secretary of State Hull himself said before the National Foreign Trade Convention in New York City on October 10, 1939:

From the very outset of the present war, the belligerents have begun to subject their foreign trade to rigorous government controls, which have already far surpassed in comprehensiveness and thoroughness the regulations put into force during the earlier period of the last war. The drastic restriction by the belligerents of imports unessential to the prosecution of hostilities and their concentration on imports needed for war will place before our exporting industries serious problems of adjustment. Whether the net result of these factors will be an increase or a decrease of our total exports to Europe, no one can tell at this moment. Whatever the result, it will be determined by conditions over which we have little or no control.

That is my complaint, among others. It is one of my fundamental complaints against extending the trade-treaty program at the present time.

The distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], who now occupies the chair, repeatedly stated in the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee that it might be well to leave the existing treaties where they are, but to stop where they are for the period of the present and approaching emergency, because conditions are so utterly chaotic, so utterly unpredictable that it is absurd to think that we can deal with them on any such wishful good-neighbor basis as we have contemplated in the past. I am not complaining about good neighborliness or even about the unconditional favored-nation policy in connection with tariffs in normal times; that is all very well; but these are abnormal times. Mr. Hull himself says that the result of these trade obstacles around the world will be determined by conditions over which we have little or no control. Yet we go right along writing unconditional most-favored-nation tariff treaties, giving everything we have to everybody else in the world, holding nothing back, while the world, in turn, gives us precious little reciprocating dividends, and we cannot do anything about it under existing circumstances.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. HARRISON. So the Senator is against the most-favored-nation provision in trade agreements?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; under war and post-war readjustment conditions.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator make that exception? He agrees with the platform of his party in 1932 and in 1928, does he not?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, indeed.

Mr. HARRISON. And he is in agreement with the views and expressions of Chief Justice Hughes on this question?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is going back to 1922. I have forgotten precisely what the Chief Justice said when he was Secretary of State, but I am inclined to think that what he said I could agree with.

Mr. HARRISON. He did not say anything about an exception in time of war. He himself was strong for the most-favored-nation clause.

Mr. VANDENBERG. He was acting then in a peace era and did not have the conditions to confront which we confront today.

Mr. HARRISON. And the Senator's party said nothing in its platform about war being an exception.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It does not make any difference whether the platform said anything about a war exception or not; I make a war exception so far as I am concerned, and the war has made an exception whether the Senator from Mississippi or I like it or not.

Mr. HARRISON. I just wanted to get the matter clear, because the Senator's views will have great weight throughout the country, and they might be accepted as a repudiation of his party's prior platform; and we would not want that to happen.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No. I appreciate the Senator's belief that Senatorial opinion still has some authority in the country. If it does, the statement which the Senator from Mississippi himself signed—if he wants to discuss ancient history—on September 29, 1929, ought to have a great deal of influence with the country.

Mr. HARRISON. When I signed that statement the Supreme Court had not passed on the question; and I abide by the action of the Supreme Court, as expressed through Chief Justice Taft.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; the Senator has to abide by the opinion of the Supreme Court, and so do I.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and I thought the Senator from Michigan was a good enough soldier to abide by it also.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So do I have to abide by it. As a matter of fact, the Court sustained my own position when it repudiated the position of my genial friend the Senator from Mississippi. But I do not have to surrender any great, fundamental convictions if the Court and I should happen to disagree upon some proposition; and when I read what the Senator from Mississippi had to say in 1929 about the horror and the degradation to which Congress was submitting itself by delegating a little, limited, elastic-tariff power to the United States Tariff Commission and the Chief Executive, I am amazed that even his fidelity to the opinions of the Supreme Court can so completely wipe out all of the convictions which he so bravely asserted upon that occasion. Mr. President, it almost breaks my heart. I will not read the statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. It would be the best part of the Senator's speech if he should read it. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. Under the Senator's urging, I will read it. [Laughter.] The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] will now have to relieve me of the hopeful promise I made to him that I should be through in 60 minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, of course it is not the first time a Republican ever broke his promise. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; but I can think of no Republican promises that have been broken so spectacularly as certain Democratic promises. What were some of those promises about reducing the expenses of government 25 percent? Well, that breaks my heart, too. I will not go into that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. If it will please the Senator or shorten his speech so that we may get along, I will admit everything that appeared in that statement at that time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his confession.

Mr. HARRISON. And I withdraw the suggestion that if the Senator should read the statement, it would be the best part of his speech.

Mr. VANDENBERG. All right. That further complicates the situation.

I will compromise with the Senator from Mississippi, and content myself with merely a few quotations from the philippic which he delivered in 1929 against a very modest, limited delegation of tariff-making power to the Executive under the elastic provision.

Was the Senator about to rise?

Mr. HARRISON. No, Mr. President. I merely want to say that I have heard that statement so often from Republican lips that I know it by heart; but I am not going to let that cause me to read from the Senator's speech of 1932, which was just opposite to the position he has now taken.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I disagree with the Senator. I will stop right now and let him read that speech. I should like to hear it.

Mr. HARRISON. No. The Senator talked about logrolling, and bringing tariff changes back to Congress for approval, and so forth.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; let us have a quotation. The Senator has charged me with inconsistency. According to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], that is not a crime; but I should like to know in what respect I am inconsistent.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has not yet argued the question of submitting agreements to Congress for approval. I imagine that will be in his second edition.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator thinks I am going to be inconsistent by and by?

Mr. HARRISON. Probably, yes; because the Senator talked about logrolling, and about tariff changes having to come back to Congress for approval.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Suppose we wait until I am inconsistent before I discuss the matter.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well; then I will delay it. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, these detours are very interesting and somewhat illuminating, but they really do not bear very heavily upon the desperately important point which is before the Senate. I think I shall return to my fixed plan of presenting what remains of my argument upon this subject, and simply ask that at this point there be inserted in the RECORD this magnificent statement, which is not alone that of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], but is equally the statement of the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The view which was expressed by those Senators at that time was subsequently overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States; was it not?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes. Before the Senator from Missouri came in, we canvassed that ground.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want to lead the Senator into repetitious byways.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I simply suggest in rebuttal that although the Supreme Court can decide the law, I am sure my dear friend from Missouri has many convictions which no court could overturn.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is perfectly true, Mr. President; but when I undertake to state a legal proposition, I take the law as it is and not as I think it ought to be.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not discussing a legal proposition. I am discussing the theory and purpose of this trade program.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator is discussing what these other Senators stated at that time as a legal proposition, upon which they have subsequently been overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States on a number of occasions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; the statement is not a statement of a legal proposition at all. In fact, I do not think much is said in the statement about the legalistic phase. It is a magnificent apostrophe to the importance of retaining in the Congress of the United States control over taxation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

JOINT STATEMENT ISSUED BY DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE ATTACKING PRINCIPLE OF PERMITTING PRESIDENT TO PASS UPON TARIFF RATES

September 29, 1929, the eight Democratic members of the Senate Finance Committee issued a public statement in which they attacked the principle of permitting the President to pass upon tariff rates as being unconstitutional and a menace to the democratic form of government. The statement follows:

"A question of far-reaching consequence transcending considerations of party, prompts us to issue a public statement in relation to the so-called flexible provisions of the tariff bill now pending before the Senate.

"The question involved is one that in our opinion strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of the Government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

"Whatever argument could be advanced during the war and immediately following for delegation to a degree of the taxing power to the Executive unquestionably no longer exists. To incorporate now in the law any recognition of a right of the Executive to impose taxes without the concurrence of the legislative branch is without justification.

"Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable. It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government, for which the independence of the country was attained and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

"There is no issue here as to the integrity of any Executive who has had or may have extended to him the exercise of this power. The issue is one of taxation by one official, be he President or monarch, in contrast to taxation by the representatives of the people elected, entrusted exclusively with the power to seize the property of the citizen through taxation. If proof were needed that the danger which the forefathers foresaw is inherent in this issue, a mere casual inquiry into the methods employed, selfish influences used, sinister schemes and contrivances brought to bear, one need but examine the record.

"The principle is: Are taxation laws and their application to be made virtually in secret, whatever may be said about a limiting rule, or are they to be enacted by the responsible representatives of the people in the Congress, where public debate is held and a public record made of each official's conduct?

"The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character is tyranny. Resistance to the impairment of this popular right has largely occasioned many of the wars and revolutions of the past.

"An issue of this importance should not be associated with the opinions or necessities of those interests, States, or sections that directly profit by some rate schedule in the body of the tariff act. With respect to the principle here at stake, any trading or log-rolling is especially unjustifiable and indefensible. Neither should we be unduly influenced by the attempt to divert attention from this momentous issue by condemnation of and emphasis upon the dilatory and unsatisfactory results of congressional procedure.

"No one seeks to prevent or in any way to interfere with the investigations and reports of the Tariff Commission in connection with emergency tariff legislation. The point is, we emphatically insist that final action and responsibility based on Tariff Commission reports shall be taken by the Congress.

"For the purpose of preventing apprehended congressional delay an amendment has been made providing for the submission of the reports to the Congress by the President, and, furthermore, an amendment will be presented strictly limiting action by the Congress to matters germane to the particular subject matter or rates recommended by the President after investigation by the Tariff Commission.

"We do not hesitate to say that if this extraordinary and what we believe to be unconstitutional authority passes now from the Congress, it is questionable if there will ever again be a tariff bill originated and enacted by the Congress.

"It is our solemn judgment that hereafter all taxation through the tariff, and regulation of commerce thereby, will be made by the Executive. It is the inherent tendency of this tariff-changing device and the apparently conscious purpose of its proponents to use it to keep the tariff out of Congress, where it is such an embarrassing business, as everyone knows, to the party that profits politically by it. So, also, it will be of distinct advantage to the interests that are the direct beneficiaries of the tariff.

"In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his Government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.

"In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad public view of this important public question, we make this appeal.

"PAT HARRISON, of Mississippi.
"WILLIAM H. KING, of Utah.
"WALTER F. GEORGE, of Georgia.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Now, let me get back to a discussion of the unconditional most-favored-nation policy and its relationship to this law, because I think it is of fundamental importance in connection with the decision we are about to make.

In the trade conditions now existing throughout the world, in the presence of all these various new trade obstacles and trade devices, it is absolutely impossible for us to get our money's worth, or anything like our money's worth, under the unconditional most-favored-nation policy. There is an "escape clause" in most of these treaties which would permit us to terminate the treaties on short notice in case of a few of these foreign obstacles; notably, in case depreciated currencies prejudice the industry or the commerce of the United States. But "escape clauses" seem to make little difference. We have never used them, although between the signing dates of the treaties and the last of November 1939 currencies of European agreement countries had depreciated as follows:

	Percent
France	66
Belgium	29
Switzerland	31
The Netherlands	22
The United Kingdom	17
Finland (before the war)	9
Sweden	6

This means that one American dollar buys more foreign money, and that imported goods thus become proportionately cheaper. But look briefly at some of the other barriers which shut us off from most-favored-nation treatment, while we continue to grant most-favored-nation treatment to those who cut us off, making of Uncle Sam a sort of international Santa Claus now, as it were.

The United States Tariff Commission tells me, under date of March 5, 1940, that 1,584 bilateral agreements have been made between other countries since January 1, 1935, which is to say, since our trade-treaty program got into full swing. Some of them are inconsequential, and some do not directly affect trade. This is what the Tariff Commission says about it—and I quote briefly from a recent letter to me:

> Ordinarily, provisions relating to quotas cannot be generalized; and there are more and more important instances of discrimination against the United States in the case of quotas than in that of customs duties.

I do not care where we turn in exploring this problem. We may turn to depreciated currencies, we may turn to embargoes, we may turn to bilateral agreements, we may turn to any of these devices, and I can bring official testimony out of the executive department of the Government, to prove that all those obstacles are infinitely more important to export trade and to the prevention of the recapture of our export trade, than are the regular tariff laws themselves.

I repeat, Mr. President, I am complaining that this is a desperately dangerous time for us to go on with unconditional most-favored-nation agreements, at least until we have weathered our way through the devious and probably devilish post-war competitions which we yet confront in connection with ultimate readjustments.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I wish to understand that point more fully, and I ask the Senator from Michigan whether he found that the Executive had reduced the rates of duty on 1,584 items.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President; that is a different figure. I said that other countries, with most of whom we have trade agreements, since January 1, 1935, have made 1,584 bilateral agreements among themselves, giving one benefit to one and another benefit to another, none of which are generalized to us, except with a few casual exceptions.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the Senator permit an observation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I notice in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1768, that Representative ANGELL, of Oregon, makes this claim, namely, that the Executive "has reduced over 1,000 rates of duty, has agreed not to increase rates on 100 additional items, and has agreed not to place duty on some 150 products" which are now on the free list. I am very much interested in the Senator's able discussion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the figures cited by the Senator are correct. The latest compilation I have is approximately the same as that which the Senator has read.

Mr. President, when we generalize to all the world the tariff benefits we give to some one country in a trade treaty on the naive theory that they are going to generalize everything else to us in this present distraught, chaotic world, we inevitably get the worst of it, in the face of all these other trade restrictions. For example, when we reduced our tariff on manganese in the Brazilian trade treaty of 1936, in return for some presumed reciprocal advantage from Brazil, we then promptly generalized this reduction to all the world. Since then Brazil has sent us 250,000 tons of manganese under the reduced duty, but Russia has sent us 960,000 tons of manganese under the reduced duty. And what did Russia give us in return for this great tariff advantage? I should be glad to suspend and let someone tell me if he knows. What did we get? Exactly nothing, not even the gratitude of Mr. Browder and his fellow travelers.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. With reference to the manganese item, which the Senator is now discussing, at the last session the Senate and the Congress passed the Thomas Act, dealing with strategic materials which have to do with national defense. There are several States, including my own State, which are deeply interested in manganese production and have manganese developments, and while we are trying to get along and develop in an orderly way the manganese industry, in keeping with the Thomas Act and in keeping with national defense, the events to which the Senator from Michigan has adverted have occurred. In other words, instead of helping develop the industry in this country so that we could take care of the slack of unemployment about which we talk once in a while, we are getting manganese from Brazil.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator. That is the way it works. Let me use a very simple, plain example of not only how it could work, but how it will work, undoubtedly, just as soon as the law is extended again; because I am perfectly sure that just as soon as the law is extended we shall then be told that a new reciprocal-trade agreement has been made with Chile, which undoubtedly will reduce the tariff on white beans.

What will happen in connection with white beans? We import 800,000 pounds of white beans from Chile. We reduce the tariff on white beans from Chile on 800,000 pounds in return for some other alleged tariff favor from Chile. Then we generalize that reduction to every other country on the globe, and we proceed to take in 8,000,000 pounds of white beans, chiefly from Russia and Manchuria, under the reduced tariff; and we get nothing in the world in return. It just does not make sense, as I view Yankee trading.

Of course, that is not the worst of the white-bean situation. At the same time we are reducing the tariff on beans, and thus increasing the imports and increasing the surplus, we are using the funds of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation to take the surplus off the market.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan whether he is aware that that extension is merely one of the legislative acts performed by the Executive, entirely by the Executive, because it happens that we do not have a most-favored-nation treaty with Russia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; the Senator is quite correct. The National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, which, by the way, bitterly opposes the extension of the trade-treaty law, put its story into statistics. It showed the Senate Finance Committee an authenticated table indicating what happened in respect to duty reductions we received and gave on all products in terms of 1938 trade. It showed a favorable balance of $62,000,000 with trade-agreement countries. But all this was wiped out, and more, by a loss of $137,000,000 to nonagreement countries to whom we gave unconditional most-favored-nation treatment.

The theory is that we will get something back from the countries some day, if and when they are reducing their general tariffs; but, I repeat, that is an utterly broken reed in the present condition of world trade. World trade is not being primarily channeled today by tariffs; it is being channeled by embargoes, bilateral agreements, currency allocations, and block exchange, and all these other devices to which I have referred; and, if the Senate does nothing else, I beg of it to listen when the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] presents his proposed amendment to the joint resolution, which will at least partially arm us in a world that is armed against us economically.

Mr. President, I have about concluded what I wish to say.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in that connection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator object to having printed in the RECORD following his remarks the views and comments of the Tariff Commission with reference to the Holman report, to which the attention of the Senate has been directed?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have not the slightest objection. I am glad the Senator interrupted me, because I have a letter from Dr. Grady dealing with the subject of unconditional most-favored-nation reciprocal advantages which I think should also be in the RECORD for whatever it is worth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to will be found following Mr. VANDENBERG's address.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I shall avoid any long presentation, at least for the present, of the rival statistics which are available in connection with this question. I think anyone with an ordinarily acute imagination can take the figures which are available in the House and Senate committee hearings and make a tariff argument to any possible conclusion he desires to reach. I would not want anyone to think that the favorable figures which will be presented have a monopoly, however, upon the argument, because it seems to me that an equally honest interpretation of the figures leads to a different result.

I merely wish to go into the figures sufficiently to indicate the foundation for this conclusion. I submit, to begin with, that no figures can be produced to sustain the convenient thesis that the American depression resulted from the Smoot-Hawley tariff of 1930, and that our world trade recovery results from the Hull treaties.

Foreign prices for the basic commodities which enter international trade stood at an index of 160 in 1925. This index fell to 71 by July 1932. Half of this decline, representing a collapse in foreign buying power, occurred prior to July 1930. The Tariff Act of 1930 could not have been even a remote cause. It was merely a belated effort to protect our own market against this foreign situation. It was in line with similar action taken by a large number of other countries at about the same time to deal with the acute world-wide price deflation which continued increasingly to plague us with numerous other devices such as exchange controls, bilateral trade agreements and finally by currency depreciation. Building construction in the United States fell a billion dollars in 1929—a year before the passage of the Tariff Act of 1930—and the total value of stocks on the New York Exchange had dipped 25 billions in this same period. The dollar value of imports fell off nearly 70 percent from 1929 to 1932; but that this resulted from the price collapse, and was not related to our tariffs or our rates of duty, is conclusively demonstrated by the fact that the decrease was at the same rate in the case of "imports free from duty" as in the case of "imports subject to tariff." I have no particular disposition to plead the cause of the Smoot-Hawley tariff or any other general Congressional revision of the tariff because I know, by painful experience, that any such general revision is bound to be a haphazard mobilization of economic decisions that cannot hope to be accurate. I hope we shall never have another general revision. On the other hand, I think the figures prove it to be indefensibly absurd to make the Smoot-Hawley tariff the "whipping boy" of the depression. This administration, in complete control of both branches of Congress, has not once moved in the direction of amendment or repeal. It has been content with a flank attack through the reciprocal trade treaty law. But if it be said that this is their answer, then this measure is frankly a device for the general downward revision of the tariff through the State Department instead of through the Congress as required by the Constitution. I doubt, Mr. President, whether the prolonged depression can ever be rationalized to a point where we can put an accurate finger on any one cause. But if I were to attempt it, relatively speaking, I should say that the President made one of the major contributions when he forced the collapse of the London Economic Conference in 1933.

But back to the figures for just a moment more. Recovery—that is, relative recovery, because stabilized recovery is still somewhere around that mystic "corner" which we have never reached—relative recovery timidly began in 1932. As foreign prices hit bottom, production declined and inventories were absorbed and prices advanced. With this beginning in world-wide recovery came increases in the dollar value of both exports and imports. This is noted in the world volume of foreign trade as early as 1933. By 1936, when the Hull program got in full swing, we had already increased our exports by nearly a billion dollars and our imports by approximately $700,000,000. Thus, increases in our foreign trade were as great before the trade treaties as they have been since. The Hull treaties had nothing to do with this reversal in trends. The total volume of world trade is the factor of prime control. We had 13.8 percent of world trade—exports and imports—in 1929. This was down to 10.8 percent in 1932. It was still 10.7 percent in 1938. The 1939 figure is not available. Certainly the Hull treaties have helped—in spots. They have hurt—in other spots. The important point is that a world depression hit us in 1929 and we shall ourselves pull out of it, in terms of external trade, in just about whatever degree the world itself pulls out.

Does this mean we need to do nothing about it? No, indeed. We shall not hold our share of world trade except as we are prepared to fight, in an economic sense, for it. I freely concede that the Hull program conscientiously pursues this purpose. It was intended to implement this need. But in my view it is wholly inadequate and unrealistic—for reasons which I shall presently indicate; and it makes the colossal blunder, in my humble opinion, of failing fundamentally to gear itself to our paramount need always to preserve domestic economy in our domestic market where, over the years, we have found 93 percent of our prosperity and where we must look for it in constantly increasing degree.

Let me say again that I am rather impatient with reliance upon statistics in a contemplation of this nature because they may be used to prove so many rival conclusions. I repeat that the dislocations of recent and contemporary wars throw all calculations out of balance. Therefore I should attach unusual significance to the only table in the evidence which takes these dislocations into account. It covers the period of 1934 to 1937. First it separates out our exports in special commodity groups to countries then in war to which is assigned an export increase, in dollar value, of 14.9 percent. Then it shows an export increase of 117.9 percent to trade-treaty countries and an export increase of 126.4 percent to all other non-trade-treaty countries. In other words, we seem to do about equally well regardless of trade treaties. These trade treaties—which, by the way, are reducing our customs revenues an average of about $113,000,000 a year—are not the magic benediction which their zealous devotees, in complete good faith, have convinced themselves they are.

There are many other phases and factors of this problem, Mr. President, to which I could advert. But I think I have said enough to prove the faith that is in me. I have the deeply conscientious conviction that I am defending the best interests of American industry, American labor, and American agriculture.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say today upon this subject. I have tried to present the fundamental reason why in my view it is unwise, unsafe, unsound for the Senate to extend the reciprocal trade treaty law.

The matter presented by Mr. HARRISON during Mr. VANDENBERG's address, and ordered to be printed, is as follows:

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, March 20, 1940.

The Honorable PAT HARRISON,
Chairman, Senate Finance Committee.

DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: In accordance with your request (p. 864 of the hearings on the extension of Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act), the Tariff Commission has reviewed the tables presented in evidence (pp. 711–717) by Mr. Charles W. Holman, at the hearing held by the Finance Committee on March 5, 1940. The Tariff Commission's comments are in the attached memorandum. I trust that they will be helpful.

Sincerely yours,

OSCAR B. RYDER,
Acting Chairman.

[Enclosure]

COMMENTS ON TABLES OF THE NATIONAL COOPERATIVE MILK PRODUCERS FEDERATION OFFERED AS EVIDENCE TO THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE ON MARCH 5, 1940, AT THE HEARING ON THE PROPOSED EXTENSION OF THE RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

Summary table 1 contains serious defects which are enumerated in detail in the attached appendix and which may be summarized as follows:

1. In a number of instances the values of exports given as representing concessions obtained from individual trade-agreement countries are much too low;

2. In the figures for United States exports benefiting from "duty concessions" (which include bindings on the free list), no account is taken of the value of United States exports covered by concessions in the form of enlarged quotas, liberalized exchange treatment, etc., which, in the case of such countries as the Netherlands, Belgium, France, and Switzerland, were major factors in the agreements;

3. The very large value representing imports of articles on which concessions were made to trade-agreement colonies is improperly credited as representing imports of concession articles from non-trade-agreement countries; and

4. A value is given for United States imports from non-trade-agreement countries which automatically benefit from generalized concessions, whereas no corresponding value is shown for United States exports which similarly benefit from reciprocal most-favored-nation treatment. This last omission is serious inasmuch as there are several hundred trade treaties relating to tariffs entered into by foreign governments—many negotiated before and many since the trade-agreement program went into effect—from which the United States has benefited by virtue of either most-favored-nation agreements or the policy of the countries in extending such treatment to the United States.

Most of the other tables (except 10 and 11) submitted by Mr. HOLMAN are based on the same data as those in table 1 and consequently contain the same general defects as that table. No attempt has been made to check the accuracy of all of the data in the remaining tables, but certain errors in them may be mentioned.

The values shown for imports of industrial products in table 2 in fact include all the noncompetitive agricultural imports, such as raw silk, rubber, coffee, tea, raw wool for carpets, and cacao beans.[1]

The classification of competitive agricultural imports in tables 3 and 4 apparently follows a former practice of the United States Department of Agriculture, except that bananas are classified as competitive,[2] whereas the Department of Agriculture does not so regard them. Some of the competitive imports shown, however, actually compete only to a limited extent, if at all, with American products. Thus, of the $11,152,000 worth of competitive agricultural imports from Turkey shown in the table, $11,125,000 represents Turkish cigarette leaf tobacco, which is scarcely competitive with domestic tobacco, being used for blending purposes in order to give the flavor desired by consumers. Incidentally, the Department of Agriculture, in recognition of the difficulty of properly classifying imports according to their competitiveness, last year substituted the terms "supplementary" and "complementary," respectively, for the terms "competitive" and "noncompetitive" in reference to imports.

In table 3a (which is a summary of tables 4 and 5), it is stated that Belgium reduced duties on $5,623,000 worth of imports from the United States, whereas the correct value is $13,117,000. The figure given for Canada is $131,870,000, whereas it should be over $200,000,000;[3] the figure given for Sweden is $337,000, but should

[1] The Department of Agriculture classifies all of these as agricultural products. That a departure from this practice is made is first mentioned in a footnote in table 9 and then only with respect to rubber.

[2] That this practice is followed is not mentioned in tables 3 and 4, but it is mentioned in a footnote referring to the data in table 8.

[3] The exact value has not been computed for 1938 trade on the basis of the second agreement with Canada. On the basis of 1937 trade, however, the value would be $240,000,000; but inasmuch as be $2,327,000; and that for Switzerland is $858,000, but should be $1,019,000. Moreover, none of the values in these tables takes account of United States exports for which increased quotas or other more liberalized treatment were obtained; such concessions have frequently been more important than duty reductions or bindings would have been. If all mitigations of import restrictions be taken into account (not including bindings of dutiable or free-list articles), Swiss concessions would apply to $12,514,000 worth of imports from the United States instead of the $1,019,000 mentioned above. Corresponding concessions from France would account for $21,977,000[4] worth of trade instead of the $5,778,000 shown in table 3a.

The total value shown for imports of competitive agricultural products (table 4) from non-trade-agreement countries appears to be much too large. On the basis of the commodities classified as competitive agricultural products by the Department of Agriculture (Foreign Crops and Markets, May 6, 1939, p. 336) plus wines and fruit juices, the value of duty-reduction imports from agreement countries corresponds closely with the value shown in the table. Imports of the same classes of commodities from non-agreement countries, however, approximated $27,000,000 instead of the $57,753,000 given in the table. Moreover, as already pointed out, the extent to which imports classified as competitive are in fact competitive is open to question in some instances, for example, cigarette leaf tobacco. Imports of this commodity alone from trade-agreement countries amounted to $11,125,000, and from non-trade-agreement countries, $13,535,000.

The comparisons shown in summary table 7 as well as in the detailed tables 8 and 9 are subject to the same general criticisms as those in preceding tables and have certain additional defects. In table 8, trade with Cuba is totaled with that for other trade-agreement countries, whereas it is excluded from such totals in all of the preceding tables. This shift in basis involves the inclusion of sugar in the list of competitive agricultural imports, although it is not so classified in tables 3 and 4. The inclusion of Cuban sugar in this category results in conclusions which are the opposite of what they would have been if Cuban sugar had been excluded.

No comments are offered concerning tables 10 and 11, neither of which was submitted at the time of the hearing and neither of which has been scrutinized by the Tariff Commission.

APPENDIX

Comments on table 1

1. The values shown under "Total exports" are in some instances based on foreign import statistics and in others, on United States export statistics. The values for Canada and France, for example, are based on foreign statistics whereas the value for the United Kingdom is apparently based on United States statistics, although no footnote is attached to indicate that fact, as is done in the case of certain less important countries. (The value of the United Kingdom's imports from the United States was about $576,500,000, compared to $513,955,000 shown in the table.)

2. No account is taken of the value of United States exports covered by concessions in the form of enlarged quotas, liberalized exchange treatment, guarantees against discriminatory internal taxes, and the right to compete on a nondiscriminatory basis in the supply of materials marketed by Government monopolies or agencies, or used for public works. In the case of a number of countries, concessions of this type have benefited United States export trade more than bindings or reductions in duty have done.

3. As regards the values shown under "Total imports," imports from Finland in 1938 were $18,071,000, not $24,769,000, and those from Costa Rica were $4,102,000, not $5,060,000.

4. Under the caption "Total duty concessions" there are included the values of trade covered by bindings on the free list, which constitute a large fraction of the values of imports into the United States shown under this caption. Comparisons between concessions granted and concessions obtained which include such bindings may be questioned because the proportion of United States total imports which has been bound on the free list is several times larger than the proportion of foreign countries imports from United States which they have bound on their free lists.

5. The values and ratios shown under "Exports—Total duty concessions" for several of the trade-agreement countries are much too low. The value for Belgium should be $21,816,000 instead of $17,989,000; that for Colombia should be $31,022,000 instead of $16,182,000; that for the Netherlands should be $34,568,000 instead of $19,338,000; that for Switzerland, $15,939,000 instead of $8,340,000; that for Canada about $300,000,000[5] instead of $186,565,000; and that for France, $26,074,000[6] instead of $9,875,000.

6. The values shown under "Exports—Total duty concessions" do not take account of the value of trade covered by concessions to third countries which trade-agreement countries have generalized to the United States by virtue of their most-favored-nation commitments. The Tariff Commission has not attempted to determine the value of such trade but it is considerable. About 300 commercial agreements relating to tariffs have been negotiated by trade-agreement countries between 1935 and 1940. The United States has received by generalization all the concessions made by these countries to third countries not only in these agreements but also in all prior commercial agreements which had not expired.

7. The values shown under "Imports—Total duty concessions" are substantially correct for the individual trade-agreement countries actually listed in the table but it is a serious defect to credit the "non-trade-agreement countries" with the value of trade covered by concessions of the United States to trade-agreement colonies (a footnote indicates that this procedure was followed). Of the $641,263,000 shown for imports of concession articles from non-trade-agreement countries, at least $215,000,000 represents imports from trade-agreement colonies of such commodities as rubber, tin, coffee, and tea, which were bound on the free list, and a considerable additional sum represents duty reductions and duty bindings on imports from such colonies. Adjusting the figures for only the $215,000,000 worth of free commodities from colonies would give a total for imports of concession items from trade-agreement areas much larger than that for imports of corresponding items from non-trade-agreement countries—the opposite of what is indicated in the table.

8. The required revisions in the other columns of table 1 would, of course, greatly affect the values shown in the net gain column.

Mr. GEORGE obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I shall have no objection to interruptions; but first I should like to finish, without interruption, what I have to say on two main phases of the proposal to extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act; and then I shall be glad to answer whatever questions may arise in the minds of Senators.

In the beginning, I should like to say that I presume that the thoughts of most of us undergo changes as we advance in years and experience. We do not necessarily grow wiser, but nevertheless our opinions and judgments undergo changes. I have never at any time been a free-trader. I have never at any time doubted that reasonable tariff duties total Canadian imports from the United States were about one-eighth lower in 1938 than in 1937, an estimate based on a corresponding reduction in the aforementioned value would give a total of about $210,000,000. The $240,000,000 includes trade covered by duty reductions under the most-favored-nation provision which had not been in effect before the agreement of 1936.

[4] This value includes trade covered by most-favored-nation treatment first extended under the agreement. Without this inclusion, the above value would be $20,035,000.

[5] The exact value has not been computed. An estimate based on the value for 1937 ($358,000,000), however, would indicate a total of about $310,000,000 for 1938. The $358,000,000 includes duties reduced by the most-favored-nation provision which had not been in effect before the agreement of 1936.

[6] Including also trade on which duties were reduced by the most-favored-nation provision not previously applicable. Without such inclusion, the value would be $24,132,000.

are proper and necessary for the protection of American labor and industry and the standards of living in America.

I very well remember what a distinguished Republican stated to me when I first entered this body. I refer to the late Albert B. Cummins, of Iowa. He said that all his life he had believed in the protective doctrine of his party as he understood it, but that as he neared the end of a long career in the Congress of the United States he found that he had never been able to vote for a single Republican tariff bill when it had been finally framed and was ready for final vote.

By that statement Mr. Cummins meant that, although he believed in protection, and although he was thoroughly in accord with the doctrine of protection as he interpreted it, by the time a tariff bill had reached the final stages and was ready for passage so much logrolling had entered into it, so much pure politics, so much insistence by Senators and Members of the House on higher or lower duties as they thought the interests of their particular districts and States demanded, that the thing had become an unscientific application of what he regarded as true protective principles.

Subsequently I learned that he was entirely correct. I did not then altogether share his view; but after I had lived through the 18 months of 1929 and 1930 in considering the present Tariff Act, both in committee and on the floor of the Senate, I reached the conclusion that whatever intent and purpose might guide those who were honestly trying to frame a fair and reasonable protective tariff, and whatever sincerity of purpose might guide those who candidly believed in lower tariff rates and duties, when we finally reached the end of the day the Tariff Act itself spoke all manner of compromise, as all legislation must. Obviously in this field such compromise altogether left out of sight the fair, reasonable, and just protection to which many industries, in my judgment, had shown they were entitled, and overrode and altogether lost sight of reasonable reductions in rates in the many instances in which such reductions should have been made.

I dare say that the bill pleased no one. I do not have to remind the Senate that eminent Republicans voted against the Smoot-Hawley bill for the same reason given by the late Senator Cummins in his statement to me shortly after I entered the Senate.

Mr. President, in the course of the years some of us have held to the view that the flexible tariff, as found in section 315 of the 1922 act, and section 336 of the 1930 act, constituted an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the Executive. However, we are obliged to deal realistically with matters of this kind. The courts have clearly settled the issue which was raised by many eminent Democratic Senators and Members of the House who were undoubtedly learned in the law, as well as by some Republicans. I shared the view that an unlawful delegation of legislative power was attempted in the flexible provisions of the Tariff Act, and I so expressed myself.

Since I have been a Member of the Senate I have shared the view—and I hope to leave the Senate with that view still strong within me—that it is more than unwise for Congress unnecessarily and improperly to delegate its power to the executive branch of the Government or to any agency, even though it may lawfully do so. I think no one can deny that, Mr. President, because since 1933 I think I have objected more often than has the average Senator on this side of the aisle—and I dare say more often than has any voice on the other side of the aisle—to acts which I thought certainly and unmistakably gave to the Executive powers which should have been retained by the Congress.

But, Mr. President, there are fields in which Congress cannot exercise its legislative power save through reliance upon the executive branch of the Government. It would be folly to say that Congress could consider the almost innumerable transportation rates which apply to various articles carried in commerce between the several States; in other words, that Congress could fix passenger rates and all the multitude of freight rates that apply to our domestic commerce. Yet Congress is given the power to make the rates; that power resides nowhere else; but the Congress must use a well-informed and experienced group of experts to consider all the problems involved in our vast, complicated, and complex system of transportation.

So, Mr. President, Congress, and Congress alone, has the power to regulate commerce between the United States and foreign countries. But can Congress do it alone? The power would be a futile grant if Congress alone were called upon to discharge that important duty and obligation. Congress can impose tariffs on imports coming into our country, but suppose the time arrives when we must consider the volume of our exports, when we must consider the volume of our foreign commerce and trade, how can the Congress regulate all of our foreign commerce save by calling on the Executive, by invoking the powers of the Executive?

The Executive has no power to regulate foreign commerce. The President of the United States, by virtue of his position as Chief Executive under our Constitution, has no power to fix a single rate upon an American railway or to impose a single fractional part of a duty upon a single import coming into our country or to impose or raise an embargo against any import coming into our country. That power resides in Congress, and whenever the President has exercised it, as he has exercised it since the very beginning of the Government under the Constitution—he has exercised it in his uncontrolled discretion as to when he would put on an embargo or take off an embargo, with no rules whatever laid down—he has exercised that power under a grant given him by the Congress; that is to say, the Congress has provided for the embargo and left it to the President whenever, in his discretion, in the national interest, it became necessary to impose it or to lift it.

Mr. President, I said a few days ago—and I repeat, because I think it is important—that the Trade Agreements Act is in no sense a tariff act. It is section 350 of the present tariff act; that is to say, it is added to the tariff act as a separate section and provision. It does provide for increasing or lowering tariff duties under certain fixed standards, or, at least, principles, as I hope to show later, all the rates fixed upon the various articles of manufacture in commerce within the tariff act; but it is not a tariff act.

It is predicated upon the single ground that whereas the Tariff Act of 1930 sought primarily to measure duties upon dutiable articles coming into the country by the difference between the cost of production of the article abroad and the cost of the same or a similar article in the United States, whereas that Tariff Act was predicated upon the recognition of the necessity of protecting our industries—and let us say, fairly, our labor, so as to maintain the American standard of living—it had entirely left out what also is an essential part of commerce, what also is the very life of commerce, what also is the very breath of commerce, and that was the distribution of our commerce, the distribution of articles produced in foreign countries and in the United States into the channels of international trade.

So the Trade Agreements Act was designed and intended, and in every line it manifests its purpose, to increase the distribution of foreign commerce. We certainly had gone far enough, in the opinion of Congress, by 1934 in raising rates to take care of any reasonable difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. We found ourselves, whether because of the passage of the tariff act or of world conditions or of what not, with a suddenly dwindling commerce. We virtually saw foreign commerce, international trade, cease. It is not necessary to say that all that was due to the operation of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act; but that was the condition, and that is what I am trying to emphasize. How should we meet it? If we wanted to increase our foreign commerce, Congress alone had the power to do it, because it alone had the power to restrict or to prohibit or to regulate commerce between the several States of the United States and all foreign countries; and that power was useless, that power was futile, that power could not be made effective, unless the power of the executive branch of the Government could be invoked.

We can reason about this all we want to; we can exert ourselves as much as we please about concentrating power in the Executive, but we were merely making a sensible and necessary use of another branch of the Government in our effort to exercise our own undoubted and exclusive power to regulate foreign commerce.

Mr. President, I do not intend to take any great length of time on the general question that even a tariff act is a regulation of commerce, but I am going to read an excerpt or two from the opinion of the court in the case of Board of Trustees of Illinois University—the other day I said "Chicago University"—the Board of Trustees of Illinois University against the United States. Chief Justice Hughes handed down this opinion:

Appellant argues that the Tariff Act is a revenue measure—that it is not the less so because it is framed with a view, as its title states, of encouraging the industries of the United States (Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 394, 411, 412); that the duty is a tax, that the act is not one for the regulation of commerce but is an exercise of the taxing power, and that, as such, it is subject to the constitutional limitation that the Congress may not lay a tax so as to impose a direct burden upon an instrumentality of a State used in the performance of a governmental function.

He is speaking of the Tariff Act, not of the Trade Agreements Act—

Said the Chief Justice:

It is true that the taxing power is a distinct power; that it is distinct from the power to regulate commerce—

Citing the old case of Gibbons against Ogden.

It is also true that the taxing power embraces the power to lay duties. But because the taxing power is a distinct power and embraces the power to lay duties, it does not follow that duties may not be imposed in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce. The contrary is well established.

Citing Gibbons against Ogden.

Under the power to regulate foreign commerce Congress impose duties on importations, give draw-backs, pass embargo and non-intercourse laws, and make all other regulations necessary to navigation, to the safety of passengers and the protection of property.

In this case the Court flatly and explicitly held that the Tariff Act of 1922 was itself an act to regulate commerce, and undoubtedly the act which it is now sought to extend is one designed entirely to regulate commerce, to wit, to increase the volume of our foreign commerce.

Mr. President, it has been suggested that a different Chief Executive, acting under the Trade Agreements Act, might raise duties. In the case of some particular special interest that might be true; but I very much doubt whether many duties could be raised, because the President would be compelled to act within the terms of the act. The whole act points unmistakably to a reasonable reduction of duties for the single purpose of increasing the volume of commerce. The President could not go contrary to the act, and I dare say that no Yankee, with his capacity to trade, would ever think he could get a bargain by increasing the price of the thing he had to sell when the price already was too high and in the beginning had been placed too high. The whole purpose of the act is to provide for reasonable readjustments of these rates.

Mr. President, two important legal questions are involved in this proposal to renew the Trade Agreements Act.

The first one raised here has been and is whether or not a trade agreement negotiated under this act and proclaimed by the President is a treaty. If a treaty, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. PITTMAN], in a most admirable address, frankly said that it should be ratified by two-thirds vote of the Senators present. That, of course, is true. If it is a treaty, then even though the Congress may have in advance given to the President some authority to negotiate—which, of course, would be a mere gratuity, because the President does not need any authority to negotiate a treaty; he may negotiate a treaty on any question on which he wants to negotiate a treaty—even if the Congress had asserted its desire, at least, to instruct the President to negotiate a treaty, and had told the President in effect what it wished put into the treaty, if it were a real treaty, undoubtedly within the category in which we place treaties, the mere fact that the Congress by its predecision had requested its negotiation would not make the treaty a valid treaty and a part of our supreme law as it is declared in our Constitution unless it should be ratified by the Senate by two-thirds vote of the Senators present.

I think unquestionably that position is sound.

Mr. President, I do not think trade agreements negotiated by the President under the Trade Agreements Act of 1934 constitute treaties in the constitutional sense. I know that I shall be repeating some things which have been said here, but I shall read them for the purpose of emphasizing them.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be glad to yield. I should be pleased if the Senator would withhold his question until a little later; but I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will not press the question. It was pertinent to the remark just made by the Senator from Georgia. I understood the Senator to say that he did not regard a trade agreement to be a treaty within the meaning of the Constitution. My question was to be: Would the Senator make that statement if a trade agreement undertook to modify an existing treaty?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes, Mr. President; if it related itself to the powers and provisions of the statutory enactment upon which the agreement was made, I would.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So it is the Senator's contention that a trade agreement which is not a treaty is of sufficient validity to alter the terms of a treaty?

Mr. GEORGE. No; not at all. My contention is—but I did not want to anticipate it in my argument—that a trade agreement is a law, and that a law may modify a treaty, but it is not a treaty.

Mr. President, I read an excerpt from the old case of Holmes v. Jennison (14 Pet. 540, at p. 571) not so much for the sake of defining a treaty, but for the single purpose of showing, at least, that from the very beginning of the Government it has been recognized that treaties, and other agreements not amounting to treaties, were recognized by the Constitution as a part of our basic law.

I quote from Mr. Chief Justice Taney:

In the very next clause of the Constitution, the States are forbidden to enter into any "agreement" or "compact" with a foreign nation; and as these words could not have been idly or superfluously used by the framers of the Constitution, they cannot be construed to mean the same thing with the word "treaty."

* * * * * * *

A few extracts from an eminent writer on the laws of nations, showing the manner in which these different words have been used, and the different meanings sometimes attached to them, will, perhaps, contribute to explain the reason for using them all in the Constitution; and will prove that the most comprehensive terms were employed in prohibiting to the States all intercourse with foreign nations.

Here was involved an extradition treaty between Vermont and Canada. The opinion quotes Vattel, who, by the way, was an eminent writer on international law whose writings were current at the very time the Constitution was framed, at the very time the Constitution was adopted by our several States.

Vattel, page 192, section 152, says: "A treaty in Latin foedus is a compact made with a view to the public welfare by the superior power either for perpetuity or for a considerable time."

Section 153: "The compacts which have temporary matters for their object are called agreements, conventions, and pactions. They are accomplished by one single act and not by repeated acts. These compacts are perfected in their execution once for all; treaties receive a successive execution, whose duration equals that of the treaty."

Mr. President, I am reading that decision for the purpose of showing that at the time the Constitution was framed, and in the Constitution itself, treaties, and agreements less than treaties, compacts, pactions, or whatever else we may wish to call them, were all recognized.

The Government of the United States in the field of international affairs is an absolute sovereign. It does not exercise granted powers or delegated powers. When the States created the Federal Government, with respect to those things that pertain to a nation in its relation and intercourse with other nations, this Nation stood boldly erect as a sovereign nation, clothed with all the power of any sovereign. Was it intended by the Constitution, which in language recognizes the existence of agreements other than treaties, to say that agreements of that sort could not be made by the sovereign unless ratified by two-thirds vote of the Senate? Undoubtedly not. By the requirement that when an international agreement reached the dignity of a treaty it must be ratified by two-thirds vote of the Senate there was not the slightest intimation or suggestion that any other form of agreement available to a sovereign nation through its executive branch might not be freely and completely used in such intercourse as this Nation might have with foreign nations.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is there any limitation upon the kind of agreements that the President may make with foreign governments?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. What are the limitations?

Mr. GEORGE. If the President's agreement relates to a matter within the power of the legislative branch of the Government, he may make it only under the direction of the legislative branch. If the agreement that he negotiates rises to the dignity of a treaty, it must be brought back to the Senate and confirmed by the Senate. There is a difference. I am now simply trying to point out that there were always recognized forms of international agreement other than mere treaties.

Mr. PITTMAN. What is the Senator's opinion with regard to this matter: Suppose the President of the United States should negotiate all the agreements he is authorized in the act to negotiate—that is, negotiate with foreign governments rates of duty on various articles for a period of 3 years—would such agreements, in the Senator's opinion, be temporary agreements of the kind the Senator has just quoted a reference to in the decision of Chief Justice Taney?

Mr. GEORGE. If made within the provisions of the act of Congress, yes; because they would have all the validity of a statute. It would not be because they were treaties.

Mr. PITTMAN. May Congress enter into contracts with foreign governments?

Mr. GEORGE. No. That is the reason I have been arguing here for quite a while that Congress may not exercise its power to regulate foreign commerce except by invoking the Executive power.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then if Congress may not enter into contracts with foreign governments, no agency of Congress may do so; may it?

Mr. GEORGE. Congress may authorize the Executive to do it; and if the Executive acts within his power, undoubtedly the act is a valid one.

Mr. PITTMAN. If Congress may authorize the President to enter into agreements with foreign governments fixing our tariff duties for a period of 3 years, can that authorization in any way obviate the necessity of ratification under the Constitution with regard to agreements made with foreign governments?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes; I think so, Mr. President, provided Congress had itself determined how the rates were to be fixed, and had merely delegated to the Executive the authority to make the rates.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is admitted, because that was in the case of Field against Clark and the Altman case, but in this case certainly no rate is prescribed which the President shall put into effect.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, Mr. President, I do not desire at this time to go into the Altman case and the case of Field against Clark, but the whole argument here has proceeded as a result of the scrambling of two different things. The Supreme Court did say in the Field against Clark case that the agreement there involved was not a treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. And why?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator argued that it was because the rates were fixed. That relates alone to the delegation of power.

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. GEORGE. That bears alone upon the question of delegated power. I think so. That is my position, anyway. So I think I have answered the question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not desire to disturb the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I call attention to the fact that the court stated that it was not a treaty——

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. PITTMAN. And it stated why, namely, because the President had been authorized to put into force and effect one of two laws, it was not a treaty. Again, it was not a treaty because there was no obligation placed on the United States Government. In both cases the President placed these understandings in effect for so long as he wanted them to be in effect.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly, the difference between putting them into effect indefinitely, and for a limited time.

Mr. PITTMAN. In the reciprocal-trade agreements, our Government is being bound for 3 years.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator is forcing me to anticipate my argument, but that is all right.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am sorry.

Mr. GEORGE. That is all right. I repeat at this point, the discussion of Field against Clark and other cases has disclosed a notable and lamentable scrambling of two arguments which have no real relation to each other. In Field against Clark the Supreme Court held that the agreement in question was not a treaty. If it was not a treaty, it made no difference how it was arrived at. If it was not a treaty, it made no difference how it came before the Congress or before the Court. The Court held it was not a treaty.

On the other question, whether there was an improper delegation of power, it is all good and well to say that two rates were fixed, both fixed by the Congress, and the President selected between the two rates, in his judgment, when he could get reciprocally equal benefits by putting in the lower rate or the higher rate. But on the question of whether the instrument in question was or was not a treaty, the Court held that the agreement which the Court had before it was not a treaty; that that fact could be determined within the four corners of the agreement, and could be rightly determined not outside of the four corners of the agreement. Whether or not there was an unlawful delegation of power is in the case, and it is very properly in the case, but not on the question of whether or not the instrument was a treaty.

I do not think anyone can doubt that when the Court is called upon to say whether an agreement constitutes or does not constitute a treaty, it will look at the instrument itself. Perhaps it will look at what led up to it, perhaps it will take into consideration all those matters which might properly be considered as a part of it. But, after all, the paper considered by the Supreme Court in the case of Field versus Clark was held not to be a treaty, that is all; it did not rise to the dignity of a treaty.

In the Altman case it was held that the agreement was not a treaty. Yet the Altman case was based upon a solemn agreement entered into by this country and France through interchange of notes. What difference does it make whether the agreement is in writing or whether it is verbal?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. In those cases the agreement was reached by modus vivendi because the agreement did not provide any duration, but could be terminated at the will of either Government whenever it saw fit.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, that is not what the lawbook says. There is simply no period for its termination provided. It may be argued that it could be terminated. So can any treaty be terminated. So can the trade agreements be terminated. In fact, the trade agreements contain four or five escape clauses which permit them to be terminated upon short notice.

In the Altman case, by an interchange of notes, an agreement was reached, an agreement which the merchant in this country thought applied to his merchandise, but which the court held did not apply to his merchandise, it is true. It was not, however, a treaty. It was held by the court not to be a treaty. It was held to be an agreement, which was beneath a treaty in point of dignity.

Mr. PITTMAN. They did hold that it was to carry out a definite statute.

Mr. GEORGE. I would think I was making myself understood to little purpose if I did not say that a trade agreement made by the President must be in conformity with the statute. I have not reached the question of delegated power. It must be in conformity with the statute and must comply with the statute. The President of the United States has no power to fix a duty, but the Congress has no actual, practical way of regulating foreign commerce unless it calls on the President of the United States, who has the diplomatic power to negotiate with a foreign country, and enter into negotiations looking to a trade agreement which will stimulate, at least according to the view of those who make it, an increased volume of foreign trade and commerce.

Mr. President, I shall read all that I find in the Altman case. I quote what the Supreme Court said about the agreement it had under consideration in that case:

> It is reciprocally agreed on the part of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the United States Tariff Act of 1897, that during the continuance in force of this agreement, the following articles of commerce, the product of the soil or industry of France, shall be admitted into the United States at rates of duty not exceeding the following, to wit:
> Paintings in oil or water colors, pastels, pen-and-ink drawings, and statuary, 15 per centum ad valorem.

Mr. President, that was an agreement which affected a tariff rate, an agreement made under a statute, it is true. It fixed one rate of 15 percent on the merchandise with which they thought they were dealing, and another rate of 45 or 60 percent, I have forgotten which, on the same commodity, depending on which rate was put into effect. According to Altman's contention, the higher rate was imposed, and he said he was entitled to the lower rate, or 15 percent, upon the importation of the merchandise purchased from France. The instrument was held to be an agreement. Of course it was an agreement. It was an agreement binding on this country. Of course it was binding on this country, because in express language it was stated, "as long as this agreement is continued in force." It was not a treaty. That is my contention.

Mr. PITTMAN. The language was, "until otherwise declared."

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct.

Mr. PITTMAN. Delegating specific power to the President to cancel at any time.

Mr. GEORGE. I suppose so, but the trade agreements carry the same power. Whether it is in fact exercised is a different question. The Trade Agreement Act merely provides that the trade agreements may be entered into, but for not longer than 3 years, and each agreement which I have examined—I have not examined them all, though I have examined a great many—provides two or three or more ways of cancelation of the agreement, even within the 3-year period, if this country desires.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does that appear in the statute?

Mr. GEORGE. The authority for it does.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think it appears in the statute.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the authority does appear.

Mr. PITTMAN. We are considering what power is authorized.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true; but I think the power is authorized in the statute.

Mr. President, I should like to make the general observation that there is no simple or categorical definition which for all purposes distinguishes Executive agreements from treaties. In some respects there are similarities, and in other respects there are important differences. The fact is that both theoretically and as a matter of actual practice, both types of international obligations serve a useful purpose in the conduct of international affairs. Both are equally binding obligations on this country in the eyes of international law. From the viewpoint of our domestic law, it is well to remember that the Constitution does not attempt to define a treaty, nor does it undertake to say that all international agreements entered into by this Government must be made as treaties. Although the Constitution does not refer explicitly to other forms of international agreements which the Federal Government may enter into, it does expressly recognize that treaties are not the only means for undertaking international obligations.

That point, Mr. President, I have already covered in my argument.

While we are all familiar with the fact that from the very earliest days of our Nation the Executive has utilized all types of agreements in conducting our foreign affairs, few of us realize that in fact at least 1,000 such agreements have been concluded without going through the cumbersome procedure of treaty making. Such agreements have been of varying degrees of formality and the subject matter covered by them has included a wide field. It is not necessary to enumerate them.

In 1934 before the Senate I undertook to indicate some of the ground covered by various trade agreements, or Executive agreements, as I called them.

International undertakings involving important political issues or changes of international policy and those involving international arrangements of a permanent character usually take the form of treaties and are concluded pursuant to the treaty-making power. Executive agreements, on the other hand, generally have been either of a temporary character or they have been made terminable at a specific time or upon comparatively short notice. For example, the authority of the President to conclude trade agreements under the Trade Agreements Act has been limited to 3 years, and the agreements themselves may not be for periods of more than 3 years, after which they are terminable on not more than 6 months' notice.

As a matter of domestic law there are certain important factors which distinguish Executive agreements from treaties. This difference can be stated most clearly in terms of things that cannot be done through Executive agreements and things that can be done under the treaty-making power. Since the purpose of this statement is to attempt to simplify rather than to complicate the problem of understanding this matter, no useful end would be served in discussing the various technical and theoretical issues which arise from this aspect. Suffice to say that books have been and continue to be written on the subject. For present purposes there are certain general propositions which illuminate the principal dividing line between Executive agreements and treaties. Our Government is based upon a three-way division of powers between the legislative, judicial, and executive branches. It is axiomatic that the Executive cannot himself make laws. Under the Constitution this is done by Congress, and, in some international matters, by the Executive and the Senate acting through the treaty-making power. Accordingly, although the Executive has the sole constitutional power in the conduct of our foreign affairs to make agreements and other international arrangements with foreign governments, he cannot, acting alone, through such agreements enact or change domestic laws.

On the other hand, in the case of treaties made by the President with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators, the Constitution expressly provides that they, along with the other laws, "shall be the supreme law of the land." Thus a treaty, generally speaking, can make or change domestic law while an Executive agreement can only operate pursuant to or in conformity with domestic law.

To understand the true function which Executive agreements such as the trade agreements play when, pursuant to prior congressional authorization, they deal with matters relating to domestic law, it is necessary to turn back to the Constitution and the fundamental division of powers between the executive and legislative branches. The Constitution grants to the Congress certain defined powers. Nothing is said in the Constitution with respect to the means or methods which the Congress may utilize for the most effective exercise of its basic powers and responsibilities except that it is provided that Congress shall have the power—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing [granted] powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Chief Justice Marshall recognized the necessity for permitting a wide latitude to Congress in choosing the most effective means for exercising its power when he set forth in the old McCulloch against Maryland case, what sometimes is spoken of as poetry, but nevertheless is one of the finest delineations of the limits to which the Congress may go in the enactment of valid legislation:

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

The powers granted to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and to regulate postal affairs afford excellent examples of situations where Congress has from time to time recognized that effective regulation could only be carried out in cooperation with other nations.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I should interrupt him now? I shall be glad to wait, if he prefers.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be through with the matter to which I am referring in a very few minutes, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. Manifestly, although Congress had the responsibility for administering to the needs of the Nation in these fields, it had no constitutional power to deal with foreign governments, nor, as a practical matter, could it undertake to conclude the international agreements which were essential to make its regulatory policies effective. Under these circumstances, Congress has on numerous occasions exercised its powers by invoking the assistance of the Executive, delegating to him the power to adjust certain matters of domestic law in accordance with the policies laid down by Congress and in connection with the negotiation of international agreements. This method has been used by Congress in fixing international postal rates and regulating the handling of our foreign mails since 1792 and the constitutionality of this procedure was upheld in an opinion by William Howard Taft as Solicitor General in 1890. The statute in effect today provides:

> That for the purpose of making better postal arrangements with foreign countries, or to counteract their adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with them, the Postmaster General, by and with the advice and consent of the President—
> Not the Senate—
> may negotiate and conclude postal treaties or conventions (5 U. S. C. A., sec. 372).

Likewise, in the field of foreign commerce Congress has on many occasions invoked the assistance of the Executive to make its legislative policies effective. By section 3 of the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897 the President was expressly authorized to conclude reciprocity agreements without Senate ratification. This act and some 15 agreements concluded pursuant to its authorization constitute a square precedent for the present Trade Agreements Act so far as the treaty issue is concerned.

It was that point which I just argued with the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In that instance, as under the present act, the agreements related to adjustments of our domestic tariff laws, such adjustments being made only to the extent and in accordance with the policies prescribed by Congress. Such agreements, like most of the postal agreements, having been concluded pursuant to a congressional statute, there is no necessity for submitting them to the treaty-making procedure in order to effect a change in our domestic law. In these cases where executive agreements deal with matters of domestic law pursuant to prior statutory authorization the change in domestic law is in fact made by the congressional statute and not by the agreements; in the case of a treaty, on the other hand, the enactment or change in domestic law is effected by the treaty itself, as provided for in the Constitution. In either case the international obligation undertaken by this Government is based squarely upon our fundamental law.

Let me say in passing that the requirement of a two-thirds vote was undoubtedly intended to place a definite check upon the Executive. The framers of our Constitution said to the executive branch, "You may negotiate treaties, and when they are ratified, not by a mere majority, as in the case of ordinary legislation, but by two-thirds vote, they then become a part of the supreme law of the land." So the two-thirds vote requirement was by way of a definite check upon the executive power. If the only thing the President does in a trade agreement is merely to change domestic law—a change which the Congress may make—why the necessity of having it submitted to the Senate and requiring a two-thirds vote to change that domestic law, to wit, a tariff rate or a tariff duty?

The whole purpose of the act was to tear down the unreasonably high duties and other restrictions as well—not only duties but quotas and exchange arrangements, and the other devices that have grown up to fetter, to cripple, and practically to stop international trade and commerce. Congress wanted to do something. Congress wanted to regulate foreign commerce. Congress wanted to make it possible to regulate foreign commerce. Congress had the power to lower its own duties, its own rates—to lift its own restrictions. Congress had all that power, but Congress did not have the diplomatic power. It did not have the power to treat with another nation. It did not have the power to say to the United Kingdom, "We want to lower our rates on some of our imports from you, but we also want you to agree to do something for us." We call on the President to do that because it is beyond the scope of our power.

But why tie the President's hands or the hands of Congress by asking that that kind of an agreement be submitted to the Senate for a two-thirds vote when Congress, in the exercise of its undoubted power—and, as I think, its duty—to regulate foreign trade and foreign commerce, has already said to the President, "All we want you to do is to carry out the part which is beyond the arm of Congress, and which touches outside nations whose duties and restrictions we should also like to see reduced, modified, or made more reasonable"?

I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Georgia that I always admire him and have great respect for his arguments. I wish to ask him a question. I do not wish to engage in a controversy with him.

As I understand the Senator from Georgia, he bases the authority of Congress on the subdivision of section 8 of article I of the Constitution, which relates to the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Mr. GEORGE. Primarily.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is not that power a continuing power? In other words, Congress may exercise that power whenever and however it desires.

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Suppose we should pass the joint resolution, thinking that we wish to make certain arrangements with foreign nations about tariffs and customs. Suppose we should make such agreements, and suppose that next year Congress may wish to make some other kind of agreements.

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly, so far as domestic law is concerned, it could do so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am talking about agreements with foreign nations.

Mr. GEORGE. Congress could not do so.

Mr. CONNALLY. It could not do so?

Mr. GEORGE. Not under international law.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why could it not do so?

Mr. GEORGE. Different principles apply. The true principle of international law undertakes to hold every nation to the faithful performance of its own undertakings.

Mr. CONNALLY. The point I am getting at is this: If the authority to regulate interstate and foreign commerce is a continuing congressional power, Congress cannot relinquish it. It is a continuing power. If this year we thought one thing and authorized trade treaties, and next year we thought differently, we could not legislate to regulate commerce if the legislation were in violation of a trade agreement; could we?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; we could do it.

Mr. CONNALLY. We would be breaking a treaty, would we not?

Mr. GEORGE. We would not be breaking a treaty, but we would be breaking our word.

Mr. CONNALLY. We would be breaking an agreement. I shall not use the word "treaty." We would be breaking our agreement.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is the purpose of the act that we shall not break our agreement, but shall adhere to it for 3 years.

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly so. I hope so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let me enlarge on that point for a moment.

Let us say that international trade has fallen off to a very low level, as it did in 1932 and 1933. Let us say that it has almost disappeared. Let us say that Congress examines the Constitution and finds in the Constitution its authority to regulate trade with foreign nations. Let us assume that Congress says, "We should like to reduce some of our duties and lift some of our restrictions; but in order to effectuate what we have in mind, to stimulate foreign trade and commerce, we must have corresponding reciprocal action on the part of foreign countries. In other words, we must persuade some other nation to agree with us."

Congress, having the authority to regulate commerce, but finding that the grant of power to it is futile unless it can invoke the arm of the Executive, decides to invoke the arm of the Executive and call upon the President to negotiate agreements with other countries. Now, suppose Congress says, "It would be useless for us to do this for 3 months or 3 weeks. It would be silly for us to negotiate an agreement with Great Britain, Canada, France, Brazil, or any other country for a few days, or for 6 months, or for 1 year." But suppose Congress should honestly decide that 3 years is about the shortest period of time in which it could be demonstrated whether or not a trade agreement would be effective in stimulating commerce between our country and foreign countries:

Is the mere fact that another Congress may have power under the Constitution to upset such an agreement to deter this Congress from exercising its power under the Constitution, from doing its dead level best to regulate commerce and to stimulate the flow of commerce for as long a period of time as possible?

So Congress said, "We will put a definite limitation on the power of the President. We will let him have it for only 3 years at a time; and if he wants it again, he must come back and let us renew the power."

Let me say to my distinguished friend from Texas—and there is no abler Member of this body or greater American—that, in my opinion, we can never afford to overlook the fact that while we cannot bind a future Congress, which may come along and upset the apple cart if it so desires, whenever we enter into an agreement with a foreign country, though it be accomplished by the mere interchange of notes, which does not rise to the dignity of a treaty, and whenever we give our pledged word to a foreign government, we then come under international law. Under the plainest principles of international law we cannot morally break our agreement. That is the restraining influence on the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not wish to argue with the Senator, because I do not want to get licked. [Laughter.] I thank the Senator very much for his courtesy. What I had in mind was to direct the Senator's attention to the fact that every 2 years there is a new Congress. The old Congress, of course, cannot bind any future Congress. Suppose, on the other hand—a situation which I think is wholly improbable—that the American people should elect a Republican Congress next year. That Congress would have the right to act. We hope it would act wisely. I doubt it, but we hope it would act wisely. Would not that Congress have as much power as has this Congress to regulate interstate commerce?

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CONNALLY. If that be true, and if a future Congress should repeal what we are now about to do, we should then be placed in the unenviable attitude of having repudiated an international agreement.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Out of respect for the Senator I shall not call it a treaty.

On the other hand, is there not a distinction to be drawn between the two types of legislation? I have not recently examined the historic examples which have been cited, although I examined them some years ago when the flexible tariff was under consideration. When Congress enacts a law providing that the President shall have power within certain limits—naming the articles and the rates—to apply such rates to any other country which has similar rates, or to any other country which does so and so, that is an act which brings within its effect any nation which does certain things. A criminal statute does not bring any of us within its provisions until we violate the law; but if we bring ourselves within the compass of the statute, we are amenable to it. Is there not a distinction to be drawn between the kind of legislation which does not bind the Government to do anything, and which we are at liberty to repeal the next day, and the legislation now proposed, which binds us not to change it? Under the proposed legislation we should not be at liberty to say, "We will not observe this law any longer. It is true that certain other countries have these duties, but the policy is wrong, and we will not follow it."

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly there is a distinction. I think I should be the last to deny that there is a very definite distinction. However, I do not think that fact has any real bearing upon the question of whether or not the agreements are treaties, or whether the Congress is bound to abstain from doing this year anything which it believes to be the wise and necessary course merely because it may find itself in disagreement with some future Congress.

As I read the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, it provides for the abrogation of the trade agreements upon certain conditions. The agreements themselves, as I have read them so far, all have one or more escape clauses or conditions enumerated, upon which the agreement may be terminated.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I must not annoy the Senator further. I think there is much mistaken opinion as to the effect of a treaty under the clause in the Constitution making a treaty the supreme law of the land.

A treaty has two aspects, one of which is domestic law. It is binding on all our people, and has the effect of a law. As to foreign nations, it has another effect. It has the effect of an agreement or contract. It is frequently said that we can repeal a treaty by a statute. We can repeal a treaty by a statute insofar as the treaty is a domestic law binding on our citizens; but we cannot repeal by a statute a contract or agreement with a foreign nation. We can break it, of course, but we cannot repeal it without breaching it.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator is entirely correct. We say, loosely, that we can repeal a treaty by a statute, which, generally speaking, is true; but international complications might grow out of a treaty relationship. Under international law we have no right to abrogate a treaty except in conformity with the treaty itself.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the Senator leaves the question asked by the Senator from Texas, is it not easily conceivable that what the Senator suggests may be done? For instance, suppose a trade agreement were entered into with a foreign government for 3 years, and the foreign government should violate the treaty, and the matter should be brought to the President, and the President should not abrogate the agreement under his power. Then manifestly under those circumstances a future Congress—or even the present Congress—if apprised of the fact that the foreign country had violated its part of the agreement, would have the right to declare the contract ended.

That is equally applicable to the question of treaties. I recall distinctly that one of the first acts I voted for in the House of Representatives in 1912 was one providing for the abrogation of the Russian treaty. That treaty was, as I remember, to continue until the year 1939, and the action to which I refer took place in 1912, as I recall. The Congress abrogated that treaty, and it remained abrogated until about 6 or 7 years ago when we entered into another treaty with Russia. So the Congress, in a broad way, has the right to repeal a treaty as it has the right to repeal any other law. A treaty is simply a law enacted in a different way; the Congress has the right to repeal it, and in that instance, I know, did repeal the Russian treaty at that time.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is undoubtedly correct. Of course, if a foreign nation with whom we have a trade agreement should refuse to abide by the agreement or to do certain things for failure to do which the agreement itself authorizes its discontinuance, we would, of course, legally and morally have the very clear right to abrogate it, end it, and walk out from under it.

Now, Mr. President, to continue briefly with my statement, the proclamation of the President pursuant to the authority granted him in the Trade Agreements Act actually effects a change in the domestic tariff law, just as in the case of proclamations by the President changing tariff rates pursuant to the flexible provisions of the 1930 tariff act or the 1922 act. The agreements themselves are merely one aspect of the procedure provided in the law itself for creating an international obligation which secures for us reciprocal concessions from the other country. Congress itself has provided that the proclaimed rates which are fixed in a trade agreement shall be the law. The situation is precisely the same as with every other statute in which Congress has sought the assistance of the President or another agency in carrying out the policy laid down in a statute, such as, for example, the Interstate Commerce Act or the flexible provisions of the 1930 Tariff Act, as I have just said. As the Supreme Court said with respect to the authority conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission, when "the Commission declares a specific rate to be the reasonable and lawful rate for the future, it speaks as the legislature, and its pronouncement has the force of a statute."

That was held in the case of the Arizona Grocery Co. v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. (284 U. S. 370–385).

Finally it is important to remember that there never has been a decision by any of our courts in which the validity of any executive agreement has ever been challenged so far as I have been able to find. To the contrary, whenever any of these agreements have come before the courts they have been sustained and given effect. I should perhaps qualify that statement by saying that some one or more of the acts of the Executive may have been challenged upon the ground that they were not authorized by act of Congress.

Some 10 reciprocity agreements were entered into in connection with the administration of section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1890 without being submitted to the Senate or the Congress, as I have already said.

It was in the case of Field against Clark, to which I have already referred, that this section was challenged as delegating to the President both the legislative and treaty-making powers, but the United States Supreme Court specifically rejected this contention, stating at page 694, of 143 United States:

> The Court is of opinion that the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not liable to the objection that it transfers legislative and treaty-making power to the President.

The Altman case I have already referred to.

In the case of Monaco v. Mississippi (292 U. S.) Justice Hughes stated that the Federal Government may effect an international settlement through treaty, agreement of arbitration, or otherwise.

I should like to invite the attention of the Senator from Texas to this decision or this statement of the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court in the Mississippi case in which he stated specifically that the Federal Government may effect an international settlement—that is, reach or consummate an agreement—through treaty, agreement of arbitration, or otherwise. Not exclusively through the treaty-making power.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if that case was not the one in which Monaco sued the State of Mississippi on bonds which had been issued.

Mr. GEORGE. I think it was.

Mr. PITTMAN. Was there any question of treaty involved in that case?

Mr. GEORGE. No; but the Chief Justice, in elaborating his opinion, said that the Federal Government may conclude a settlement by treaty, by agreement to arbitrate, or otherwise.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did not that arise by reason of the fact that the State of Mississippi contended that it had no authority as a State to negotiate a settlement with a foreign country?

Mr. GEORGE. I think that is true. I was not speaking of the ruling of the Court; I was speaking of the language used, which, I think, is pertinent to the whole opinion of the Chief Justice.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not doubt that diplomatic settlements may be made.

Mr. GEORGE. Two recent pronouncements of the Supreme Court of the United States give unquestioned authoritative recognition to the constitutional standing of such agreements; that is, trade agreements.

In 1936, in the case of the United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation (299 U. S. 304), the Court, referring to "treaties, international understandings, and compacts," declared that "the power to make such international agreements as do not constitute treaties in the constitutional sense," although not "expressly affirmed by the Constitution, nevertheless exists as inherently inseparable from the conception of nationality."

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator state if the Court at that point did not cite the Altman case?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. We know what the Altman case was.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; and the Court went back to the Holmes case in Fourteenth Peters, page 540; they went back to the very beginning. I know what the cases were; I think the Supreme Court knew what they were, and they were citing them as sustaining their ruling in this case.

In 1937 when the question was raised in the case of United States v. Belmont (301 U. S. 324), the case referred to by the distinguished senior Senator from Nevada in his very admirable argument before this body 2 days ago, which involved certain Executive agreements made by this Government, the Court disposed of the question in these clear terms—I am not quoting this language necessarily for the sake of saying that the agreement then under consideration was on all fours with those made under the Trade Agreements Act or the things done under it, but as showing that the Court itself recognized the existence of separate methods by which certain international agreements and arrangements may be made.

> The assignment and the agreement in connection therewith did not, as in the case of treaties, as that term is used in the treaty-making clause of the Constitution (art. II, sec. 2) require the advice and consent of the Senate.

There was undoubtedly some sort of an agreement; there was undoubtedly some sort of an arrangement, and irrespective of whether the Court was right or wrong, the significant thing is the Court's recognition of the fact that certain international agreements and relationships may be created without resort to treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. In that case there was an assignment by the Government of Russia to the President of the United States of an account in the Belmont Bank of New York, of certain sums which the Government of Russia claimed to own by sequestration. The only agreement as shown by the opinion of Court is a letter from the President to the Russian Government in which he expressed appreciation for their action and said he would conform with their desire to report as the sums were recovered. There was nothing except diplomatic correspondence.

I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me. I thoroughly agree that the President may make agreements to carry out a specific act of Congress, which is specific in its terms and which he is to execute and that he may make diplomatic settlements without the authority of Congress by virtue of his position as Chief Executive of a sovereignty, such as settlements of foreign disputes. I merely contend that all the cases to which the Senator has referred in which the Court has held that a given agreement was not a treaty were very much like those arising under the act of 1890 by which the President was simply authorized to put into effect certain duties on goods that were on the free list as against a government which would not act fairly with our Government.

In the other case, under the act of 1897, in section 3, under which the Altman case arose, there were two rates—one 45 percent, and the other 15 percent. Again, the President was authorized to put the lesser rates in effect.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. He did it by diplomatic correspondence in the case of the 1890 treaty, and no written thing at all except correspondence.

In the other case cited just now, the Belmont case, there was nothing in writing except a letter from the President of the United States, as the Court says; and it says the chief item in the letter of the President was that he thanked the Russian Government for its action, and stated that he would gladly notify it as the money was recovered. I admit that that was not a treaty, and I admit that the Court was right, so far as my opinion is concerned.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. PITTMAN. But I contend that the very differentiation the Court made in all of those cases, in which they defined what constituted a treaty, carries with it the affirmation that an agreement such as is authorized in the Trade Agreements Act, that is, an agreement with a foreign government for 3 years with regard to an important subject of public welfare, such as changing the laws of our country with regard to revenues and taxes, is a treaty. These agreements under the act itself cannot be terminated except upon violation by the foreign government. Such an agreement certainly comes within all the definitions of the Supreme Court that I have ever read as to what constitutes a treaty.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the Senator just one question. Since I have argued out the question with him before, I hope he will be frank in answering it.

Suppose the Congress, in the Trade Agreements Act, had said to the President, "Negotiate treaties for 3 years; offer to the other nations to cut our prevailing duties by 50 percent in order to get them to cut theirs;" would that have been a treaty when the President carried it out?

Mr. PITTMAN. In my opinion, it would have been a treaty. In my opinion, if we entered into a contract with a foreign government which we were morally and legally obligated to carry out for the period of 3 years with regard to any subject which affected the public welfare, it would be a treaty.

Mr. GEORGE. So the Senator thinks that would be a treaty. Then will the Senator please explain to me how Congress may regulate foreign commerce?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think, of course, that every section of the Constitution has to be taken into consideration with the other sections.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly; I think so, too.

Mr. PITTMAN. I find in the Constitution the section to which the Senator refers. I find in the Constitution another paragraph which delegates to the other House of Congress the exclusive power to initiate revenue legislation. I find that the President may make foreign contracts with the approval of the Senate, two-thirds concurring. I think we must harmonize all those provisions, if possible. I do not believe for one moment that the interstate and foreign commerce clause of the Constitution intended to repeal the primary clause with regard to the initiation of revenue legislation, or the clause dealing with treaties.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; it did not intend to do that; but I asked the Senator a fair question. I asked him if it would constitute a treaty if, under the Trade Agreements Act, the Congress itself had said, "We cut our duties 50 percent. Mr. President, as the executive branch of the Government, we call on you to enter into an agreement for not more than 3 years with any other country that will do likewise with its tariffs, and then these reduced rates of ours will become effective." The Senator has said that would constitute a treaty. Very well; I am satisfied with the Senator's answer; but I call his attention to the fact that in the very case of Field against Clark, in the case construing the act of 1890—I believe it was 1897 or 1890——

Mr. PITTMAN. The Field case dealt with the act of 1890. The Altman case dealt with the act of 1897.

Mr. GEORGE. The 1897 act of Congress had two sections, section 3 and section 4. In section 3 it did exactly what I asked the Senator; to wit, it prescribed the rates on certain specific articles, and then authorized the President to put those reduced rates in force if he found that any other country would grant reciprocally equal concessions to the United States. Very well. Now, the Senator is obliged to know that the Supreme Court held that that was not a treaty. Does the Senator take the slightest consolation from the fact that there was no time fixed during which these low rates should remain in effect in that case and under that agreement, whereas in this instance the President is limited to not more than 3 years?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think that is all the distinction that would exist in such a case.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator thinks it is?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. Then the Senator thinks Congress was just playing with the Executive; that Congress was saying, "Mr. Executive, we are going to reduce our tariffs on molasses, on sugar, on spices, and we are going to authorize you to go out and trade, but your trade is not worth a continental darn. We may violate it tomorrow, because it is not a treaty." Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. PITTMAN. Wait a minute. I do not say it could be violated, but it could be altered, because the agreements themselves, which were only diplomatic, provided that they could be suspended at any time without any excuse by the President or by Congress. Of course that is no contract.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not read in the act that which the Senator does. The Supreme Court clearly said that the agreements were not treaties, and it said it upon the ground that they were of a character below the level of treaties. There was not any of the kind of argument that has been made here about our ability to violate a solemn agreement at will. The Supreme Court never suggested that as a basis of its decision.

Mr. PITTMAN. There was not any argument on the treaty at all in any of these cases, and yet these are all the cases the other side has cited.

Mr. GEORGE. They are the only cases that have been to the courts. We cannot cite cases that have not yet been there.

Mr. PITTMAN. I know; but the facts were as stated by the Court in those cases, and I have introduced into the RECORD here the proclamations made, which are called agreements. They are in the RECORD here now. Those proclamations state that these understandings shall last until changed.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly. The trade agreements say the same thing.

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; they do. I shall get nowhere by merely disputing the Senator's word about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The Senator from Georgia refuses to yield.

Mr. GEORGE. The trade agreements that I have read specifically provide that they may be changed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, what will be the agreement next week?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know.

Mr. PITTMAN. We have to look to the statute.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know, but in the prior decided case, in which the Supreme Court has said that Congress might fix a rate, and might say to the President, "Put this low rate in force on the merchandise and articles of another country, provided the other country will grant reciprocally equal concessions to you," if it had been put into effect without saying a single word about how long it should last, I know that when the Supreme Court says that such an agreement is not a treaty, the arrangements made under the Trade Agreement Act are likewise not treaties, because it is said they shall not last more than 3 years, and that is a limitation which the legislative branch was putting on its own power. That is a safeguard that it was imposing on itself. It did not want to tie its hands beyond 3 years, and not then if certain unfair practices were engaged in by the opposite party, but certainly the Congress was trying to do something effective. Certainly it was not merely indulging in child's play. Certainly it was not frittering away its time. Certainly the Supreme Court did not mean to say, "The only thing, Mr. President and the Congress of the United States, that keeps your act and what you, Mr. President, have done under that act from being a treaty, the only thing that takes it out of the solemn category of treaties, is that the United States has reserved the right to violate its pledged word without notice at any time that it sees fit." That cannot be the distinguishing basis between a treaty in that case and a lack of a treaty in this case.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will not attribute to me the word "violation." The word "violation" is not a suitable word to employ, because the understanding itself provided that it could be terminated by a declaration at any time.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Supreme Court did not say anything about that. There is no place where they have emphasized that fact. In fact, they have not thought that worthy of notice; and, so far as I am concerned, I am profoundly grateful to the Supreme Court for not narrowing its determination of whether an agreement was a treaty or a mere executive agreement made by our country to the one thing which I think would be unworthy of a great nation, that is to say, its power to disregard it, to walk out from under it, to forget it whenever it wanted to do so. Certainly, so long as the conditions existed that were in existence when the President acted under a bona fide act of the Congress, there was an implied promise upon the part of the President and the Congress that these lower rates would be continued. Surely, between ordinary men upon the streets, armed traders attempting to cut each other's throats, that would be true. That is the law which I think would be recognized in any municipality.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator agree with me that even a more powerful argument might be made when there is no limit in the treaty, as suggested by the Senator from Nevada, than when there is a fixed time, so far as limitation is concerned, as is the case in the trade agreements?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think there is a doubt about it; but I had not reached that point. I was coming to it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, before the Senator yields the floor, there are one or two matters about which I should like to make inquiry. I do not, however, desire to interrupt the thread of the Senator's argument at this point.

Mr. GEORGE. I will be through in a moment, on the point I am discussing, at least, and I shall be glad to yield to the Senator, and answer as best I may.

Mr. President, there is one thing about which I do not think there can be any doubt, and that is that trade agreements are not treaties within the constitutional sense of the term, requiring the assent of two-thirds of the Senate before they become effective. I am sure it would be useless to pass an act making provision that, as treaties, they would have to be submitted to and approved by the Senate, because it would never be possible to arrive at any agreement with any trading or industrial nation with which we might wish to increase our trade or increase the flow of commerce. That, of course, is merely a practical consideration. But it seems to me to be beyond all doubt that these trade agreements are not treaties in the constitutional sense, and that was the only point which I thought vital in the discussion of this matter, save what I confess is a difficult question, whether the Trade Agreements Act attempts to carry with it an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the Executive.

There is one phase of that suggestion which I wish now to discuss; and I may say that I will not be able to go on with the main discussion of that point in the limited time remaining this evening, because I regard it as of very great importance. The point to which I refer is that the Supreme Court of the United States, in the recent case to which I referred, United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp. et al. (299 U. S. 304), has made a very significant decision, not new, but nevertheless significant. Rather than read the Court's language, which is far more impressive than mine would be, I will confine myself to reading what we call in my State the "headnote" of the case, as follows:

> The powers of the Federal Government over foreign or external affairs differ in nature and origin from those over domestic or internal affairs.

That is necessarily true, because with reference to internal affairs the Federal Government exercises delegated powers, and only delegated powers, or those which spring by necessary implication from the powers granted; but with respect to foreign or international matters, the Federal Government is absolutely a sovereign. Not that the President may do anything and everything. He must, of course, act under the generally applicable and related constitutional provision, even in the exercise of his power as Chief Executive of the Nation.

I read further:

> The broad statement that the Federal Government can exercise no powers, except those specifically enumerated in the Constitution, and such implied powers as are necessary and proper to carry into effect the enumerated powers, is categorically true only in respect of our internal affairs. In that field, the primary purpose of the Constitution was to carve from the general mass of legislative powers then possessed by the States such portions as it was thought desirable to vest in the Federal Government, leaving those not included in the enumeration still in the States.

The States severally never possessed international powers.

As a result of the separation from Great Britain by the Colonies, acting as a unit, the powers of external sovereignty passed from the Crown, not to the Colonies severally, but to the Colonies in their collective and corporate capacity as the United States of America.

The Constitution was ordained and established, among other things, to form "a more perfect union"—

And so forth. The point I have already covered is pertinent. I wish to call attention to one significant statement in the opinion. The court said:

In Burnet v. Brooks (288 U. S.) we said: "As a nation with all the attributes of sovereignty, the United States is vested with all the powers of government necessary to maintain an effective control of international relations."

Citing numerous authorities:

Not only, as we have shown, is the Federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate, and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the Nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate, but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude, and Congress itself is powerless to invade it. As Marshall said in his great argument of March 7, 1800, in the House of Representatives, "The President is the sole organ of the Nation in its external relations and its sole representative with foreign nations."

So, Mr. President, in this case the court held that the delegation to the President of the power to act was not required with the same exactness or with the same high degree of accuracy that would be required if the President were exercising a function exclusively of the legislative branch of the Government. They pointed out as the basis of the decision that the President was exercising a power which he himself, as the Chief Executive, had the right to exercise, but that he did not have the authority to impose an embargo, or to prevent the shipment of goods; that that, after all, lay within the power of the legislature.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. ADAMS. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. GEORGE. I am calling attention to that principle for this purpose, to wit, that in this instance the legislative power undoubtedly is to regulate commerce with foreign countries, but in order to make effective that power the Executive is called in by the Congress itself and is invited to carry on the diplomatic end of the bargaining process which the Congress itself has established. So there is here a very clear combination of the legitimate function of the Executive under the Constitution with the legitimate power of the legislative branch under the Constitution, and, although the Supreme Court has not had occasion to pass upon the exact question, I believe it highly probable—indeed, very certain—that the Supreme Court would hold that in such a case the same precision, the same high degree of specification, in laying down the standard to be administered by the Executive who was to consummate the program, would not be required, and could not be required, as in the case of the delegation of a purely legislative power to a board or commission, as was the case under the flexible provision of the Tariff Act of 1922 and under the flexible provisions of the present act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in that connection?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield; then I will yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me the Senator's view is confirmed by the fact that in dealing purely with a domestic problem in the first act to regulate commerce the only standard set up for the guidance of the Interstate Commerce Commission was the justice and reasonableness of the rates imposed. Nothing was laid down in the statute to guide them as to what was just and reasonable.

Mr. GEORGE. Precisely.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was left entirely to them.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly; and the Supreme Court pointed out that it was wholly beyond the power of Congress, as a practical question, to fix all the rates applicable to both freight and passengers to be transported by the carriers.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I must yield first to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator has largely answered the inquiry I had in mind; but I gathered from the Senator's view, and from the reading of the decision of the Court in relation to foreign exports, that the power the President has by virtue of his Presidential office may not be limited by an act of Congress; in other words, it is an absolute power, subject only to the restrictions imposed upon him by the Constitution itself. That is, we, as a legislative body, could not restrict the President in the exercise of his Executive power.

Mr. GEORGE. In international matters.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly that is true, when the power is one which lies exclusively in the hands of the Executive.

Mr. ADAMS. And he can, as he did in the Curtiss-Wright case, exercise two functions. One is an executive function.

Mr. GEORGE. Primarily that was the function he exercised.

Mr. ADAMS. Congress by the passage of a resolution had delegated to the President certain legislative activities, and those two functions were exercised by the President in conjunction. The legislative powers can only be delegated subject to the proper rules and standards.

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct. But it was said in that case that the same rule of strictness did not apply because primarily the President was exercising what the Senator has described as the Executive power.

Mr. ADAMS. There are two types of executive agreements. We have one executive agreement which the Executive makes as the Executive. We have others, which we call executive agreements, which are lesser than treaties in their stature, which the President enters into by virtue of the authorization of Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. I was simply trying to get those two types clear. I have some difficulty in following the Supreme Court in saying that when the President enters into an executive agreement by virtue of an act of Congress in relation to a foreign matter, there is a lesser requirement as to compliance with the theory of delegation. I know that that statement was made by the Court.

I did not mean to take up so much of the Senator's time, but let me make one further suggestion. The control over foreign commerce is vested in the Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ADAMS. So that the President is narrowed in his executive capacity to make executive agreements of a strictly Presidential character by the power which Congress has to control commerce. As to those things there must be a delegation.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I did not go that far. The Senator misapprehended what I was trying to say. I do think that the President, under his undoubted treaty-making power, may enter into any kind of relation that he wishes. Part of the treaty terms might apply, of course, to tariff matters as well as any other matter which he might wish to include within them, and then I do not think he would be bound by what the Congress had not previously done. In that event, of course, the treaty would come back to the Senate for ratification or rejection. I do not think the power of Congress to regulate foreign commerce can properly be regarded as restricting the treaty-making power or any other power which the President has as Executive.

Mr. ADAMS. Of course, the treaty-making power involves the executive and the legislative.

Mr. GEORGE. It involves both.

Mr. ADAMS. Both are involved in making effective a treaty.

Mr. GEORGE. Both are involved. That is, the Senate is involved in the ratification of the treaty, not in its negotiation. It has no right to interfere with or to limit the President in that regard.

Mr. ADAMS. But a treaty might involve a purely executive question.

Mr. GEORGE. It might; yes. But if it involved a purely executive question, one that lay within the jurisdiction of the Executive, I think the Congress would have nothing to do with it.

I think the Congress would have to do only with the placing of any limitations upon an action to be taken in carrying out the power granted to it, the Congress. If the power is granted to the Congress I think it might, by an act previously passed, call on the Executive, or if it were appropriate, call upon the judiciary. Of course, we cannot conceive of a circumstance under which the latter course would be appropriate. But if that power were granted to Congress it might call upon the Executive to exercise certain acts in furtherance of the execution of the power vested in the Congress, because there are manifestly some powers given to Congress which it cannot appropriately exercise, or which it can exercise only with the utmost difficulty, if at all, and particularly, it seems to me, it could not reach any general understanding with a foreign country with regard to domestic legislation. And what similar action or treatment could be expected from the foreign country unless the Congress could call on the Executive to open negotiations with the foreign country, and exercise his diplomatic power as the head of the Nation, indeed the head of the Federal Government, in dealing with a foreign government?

I do not know that I make myself entirely clear.

Mr. ADAMS. I am sorry to have taken so much of the Senator's time.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I am tempted to ask the Senator from Georgia about an aspect of this problem that parts company entirely with the question of the legality or constitutionality of these agreements. I solicit answers from the Senator because in much correspondence and in many talks I have had with people of an inquiring mind who have the highest motives—and they are very purposeful—I find much confusion. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia, whose judgment I value highly, whether he believes that the flexible-tariff provision, which has been in our tariff law for many years, is a wise provision, that is, a provision which permits the Tariff Commission to lift or lower tariff rates by 50 percent.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very frank to say to the Senator from Washington that originally I strongly doubted the wisdom of that provision, but I lived to see the growth of the process of tariffs and other trade restrictions gradually climbing until I thought the process had reached a danger point, and looking at the question practically I concluded that the only way to meet that situation was through some agency such as the Tariff Commission, or through the President, by reciprocal-trade agreements made under the Trade Agreements Act.

I very frankly say to the Senator from Washington that originally I questioned very seriously whether the flexible provision should be enacted, and I cannot say, of course, that there are no objections to it. I do not think anyone can argue that there are no valid objections to that kind of delegation of authority, even conceding we have a right to make it. But, in my opinion, we have to look at it practically; and if there is to be any gradual cutting down of rates which are high and which have within themselves not stimulated trade or perhaps have called for various adverse restrictions upon our trade and commerce by other countries, if there is to be any remedying of that situation, looking at it practically, we have to approach it by the method now being followed. Frankly, I think if we entered into a general revision of the tariff, we would find ourselves swamped in hopeless confusion, and the net result would probably be rates less scientific than the rates now in effect. Certainly they would not be more scientific.

Mr. BONE. This formula, which I believe is to be found, logically, in our tariff statutes after the Fordney-McCumber Tariff was adopted, rests upon the assumption that the Congress of the United States in its wisdom should establish first a schedule of tariff rates as a predicate upon which the formula could rest. That job, of course, under our present tariff set-up, has to be done by this body. We are not parting company with that formula. We are resting all our arguments and our assumptions on the theory that it is the duty of Congress to pass a law establishing certain levels of tariff schedules and customs duties.

Then we give flexibility to that principle by writing into the law the flexible clause which gives a leeway of 50 percent up or 50 percent down. That was the only fundamental modification of the law, until the enactment of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

Mr. GEORGE. That also is limited by the same 50 percent up or 50 percent down.

Mr. BONE. I understand, but its application rests first upon a tariff law, which is the old orthodox tariff law.

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. I have listened to the argument of the Senator with much interest, and I have read a great deal about the device of logrolling, which seems implicit in the making of tariff schedules in a legislative body; so I have tried to inquire of those who are interested, with respect to the wisdom of going beyond these orthodoxies of tariff making, such as Congress has indulged in for 150 years, and to adopt an entirely new system of making tariffs. If there be vice and evil in the logrolling implicit in all tariff operations, and if the reciprocal-trade idea, which is perhaps not a new thing, but certainly new in its operations so far as the tariff is concerned, is wise and just and proper, because it gets away from legislative logrolling, and if there is absolute virtue in it which may not be legitimately and honestly challenged—and this is the point raised by many of my correspondents—would it not be the part of wisdom to vest, not a portion of the control of so vital a thing in the Presidential discretion, but to allow the President himself and his Tariff Commission to establish all schedules, regardless of any 50 percent up or 50 percent down, so as to eliminate entirely the logrolling aspect in Congress, because the inherent vice is still there? We have written into the law these revisions, and we have given ourselves a 50-percent leeway one way or the other.

If the theory underlying the trade agreements be morally and economically sound, would it not be wise to have the President take over the job of making all tariffs, and get rid of the whole business, which has so many vices inherent in it?

That question has been posed to me many times. I find it diffcult to answer.

Mr. GEORGE. In the first place, let me say to the Senator that Congress could do what the Senator suggests, but it could do it only by laying down certain principles and standards which would prevent a collision with the general constitutional provision that we cannot delegate our legislative power.

Mr. BONE. I am assuming in my question that such limitations are written into the law.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me answer the Senator further. I do not think it would be wise to do so, in any event, because from time to time the Congress may—and I think should—undertake as nearly as possible a general revision of tariffs, or a complete revision of tariffs. I think that power should remain in the hands of the Congress. I think it is quite sufficient to give the tariff at least a reasonable flexibility, and then to establish an intelligible principle or standard to be used by some expert body in running the rate up or down within fixed limitations.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. GEORGE. I think it would be unwise and undesirable from any point of view for the Congress to undertake to put the whole burden on any agency of government.

Mr. BONE. The limit now is 50 percent either way.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the first limit; yes. There are other limits in the act.

Mr. BONE. Suppose that Congress, instead of approaching the question in the fashion I have suggested, and within such limits as would make the delegation of power constitutional, should say, "We will give the President of the United States power to regulate tariffs up or down by 80 percent or 85 percent." That would be accomplishing by indirection that which possibly might not be directly accomplished. If by giving the President 50-percent leeway either way we can do directly and constitutionally the thing we seek to achieve, possibly the court would sustain a 90-percent leeway either way.

Mr. GEORGE. Possibly. I think it would do so if adequate standards were laid down.

Mr. BONE. If that were true, the President would be permitted almost to remove tariffs, or to add to a tariff such an amount as to constitute practically an embargo.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true. I do not believe such a situation would be desirable, although I do think some flexibility in the rate is desirable, particularly to meet an emergent situation or a condition which is stubborn, as the case of constantly dwindling trade volume.

Mr. BONE. I hope I am not embarrassing the Senator by asking him to express an opinion as to whether or not a tariff commission such as the Interdepartmental Committee could exercise more discretion and wisdom than the Congress of the United States in framing tariff schedules. I have had that question put squarely and plainly to me by reputable high-minded men in both Houses of Congress. They say there is so much vice implicit in the logrolling arising from the consideration of tariff schedules that it would be much better, and would serve a higher public morality, to permit a committee such as the Interdepartmental Committee to fix schedules.

If that argument be valid, and if it has weight, it seems to me we ought seriously to consider doing so, even to the extent of allowing a leeway of 90 percent. Certainly a leeway of 90 percent would get the tariff problem out of Congress in a hurry.

Mr. GEORGE. I will say to my friend from Washington that I do not agree that that would be desirable, although it might result in obtaining a tariff which theoretically would be more nearly correct. However, it would leave out of consideration a vital principle which I think we never can afford to sacrifice. I refer to the judgment of men from every State in the Union and from every district in every State, representing the people, familiar with their purposes, wishes, hopes, aspirations, and needs. In the high sense, legislative power should never pass entirely out of Congress. It has passed out so far as making rates on our common carriers is concerned, as the Senator knows.

Mr. BONE. We retain no control over that subject.

Mr. GEORGE. No; but we could withdraw the power at any time.

Mr. BONE. That is true.

Mr. GEORGE. As the Senator says, we do not actually retain the control.

Mr. BONE. As I listen to these arguments, I am forced to ask myself whether or not the power which we have granted the Interstate Commerce Commission and all the other governmental agencies is as vital to the welfare of America as the power we grant to the President in the negotiation of reciprocal-trade agreements.

I want the Senator and my brethren to understand that in these questions I imply nothing about my own attitude. I merely seek information. If we willingly grant to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the other great agencies which we have set up, powers similar to those granted by States to departments of public works to regulate power, electric-light, and telephone rates, why are we squeamish about granting to the President or to a departmental committee the power to make tariff schedules? Perhaps we could not do any greater harm to the American economy than we did to our economy by granting similar powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Let me employ what may seem to be a vulgarism. Why make fish of one and fowl of the other? Why draw such subtle distinctions, which I confess as a lawyer I cannot understand?

If it be proper to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission almost the power of life and death over all the railroads, which represent billions of dollars of investment, why should we withhold approval, if such a suggestion were ever made, to a proposal to give to the interdepartmental committee on tariffs and the President of the United States the power likewise to regulate tariff rates?

I ask these questions because I have had them dumped into my lap, and I wish to know the answers before I vote on the joint resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am not willing to go all the way. However, I think a reasonable flexibility, such as the Trade Agreements Act, to meet situations which are constantly changing and which are very difficult at best, should be approved. In section 350 we have a method of carrying out the formula which I have already described as one which will adequately serve the people's needs without a reckless delegation of authority. Under the trade-agreements procedure we start with the Smoot-Hawley law. That law embodied the judgment of men from every State in the Union and every district in those States. Then finding that conditions had arisen which made it impossible for the tariff alone to serve as the regulator of foreign trade, we, as a Congress, felt that certain changes should be made in the 1930 act which would stimulate our foreign trade. We developed a formula, and said to the Executive, "Put this formula into effect." But, we also said, "In carrying out this function you must act within a limitation, that is, you cannot change existing law by more than 50 percent.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The question I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia bears upon the colloquy he has just had with the Senator from Washington and also with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], in which reference was made to the grant to the Interstate Commerce Commission of power to fix reasonable rates, to use the phrase of the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator from Kentucky said that the power had been entirely given to the Interstate Commerce Commission. In response to the Senator from Washington, I have just understood the Senator from Georgia to say that we had completely surrendered that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, although, of course, we could take it back.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes. I did not mean to say that we had surrendered it, but that we are now exercising our power through the Commission.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator bear in mind, when he makes that statement, the fact that the reasonableness of the rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission is always subject to review by the courts?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. They are, are they not?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that in the present act the customs duties to be fixed by the President are not subject to any review?

Mr. GEORGE. No one has a vested interest in a customs duty.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course.

Mr. GEORGE. No one has any such right. Fundamentally, we cannot give anyone such a right.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Because of that fact, Congress has given the right in the act of 1930 and in previous acts——

Mr. GEORGE. Only in one previous act.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Very well; to be technically correct, in the act of 1930 and in a previous act, Congress, recognizing the importance of having a review of a delegated power, gave to the courts the power to review; and section 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930 was eliminated by the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; it was eliminated.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So there is no possibility of review.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is correct. However, I will not permit the Senator to lead me into the statement that that is why section 516 (b) came into the act. Let me turn the argument around. Section 516 (b) came into the act because the methods adopted in securing tariffs had run wild. Many industries in the Nation were fast becoming committed to the doctrine that they were entitled to an embargo tariff, and that every possible hampering restriction should be thrown around every import which came to our shores.

Mr. President, if there were nothing else in our whole tariff history to cause me to support the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, the presence of a statute with so little moral basis as section 516 (b) would do so. It was a recognition that a producer of merchandise has some sort of vested interest in maintaining a tariff or tax imposed for his protection as against an importer who brings in merchandise.

What happened under section 516 (b)? Imports were stopped at the coasts. They were tied up almost interminably. The importer virtually had to go out of business. That is one of the reasons why our trade and commerce went down so very rapidly under the 1930 act. We had carried the embargo protectionism doctrine so far, and it had provoked so many retaliatory measures in other commercial and industrial countries, that the stream of commerce was fast drying up. I grant—and I am pleased to grant it—that when any act of the Congress may be difficult of review, or may be beyond the reviewing powers of our courts, that is a very strong argument why the Congress should go very slowly in that direction, and why it should exercise its power with the utmost care and caution in placing the authority to act in any board, bureau, or other department of the Government. I grant that. I thoroughly agree with that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very happy to have the Senator say that, because we are approaching another national election, and no Senator on this floor can foresee who will administer this act in the period for which it is proposed to be extended. The persons in authority in the State Department in 1941, 1942, and 1943 may not have the high standard of morality which distinguishes the present occupant of the most distinguished position at the head of the State Department. The persons in charge of the executive arm of the Government in 1941 may have exactly the point of view which the Senator now so eloquently and clearly deplores; and I feel that he has raised a very powerful argument against the continuance of the present act when he states that the Congress should go very slowly in delegating this extraordinary power to the executive arm of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was called out of the Chamber just a moment ago, and I do not know whether or not the Senator has touched upon this question.

As I understood the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] earlier in the afternoon, he made an argument to the effect that it is particularly undesirable at this time to continue in force these trade agreements because of the present war conditions in the world. Is it not the opinion of the Senator from Georgia that in these war conditions we are very much better off with the power in the President to make trade agreements, and with the trade agreements we have, than if we were restored to the terms of the old Smoot-Hawley Act?

Mr. GEORGE. I think so, Mr. President, and I also think that in a time of great world stress we cannot afford to abandon the sound principle of equality of treatment of other nations upon which we have insisted certainly for a long time, and nobody more strongly insisted upon that principle than did the present Chief Justice of the United States when he was Secretary of State under a Republican administration.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield. I was about to yield the floor for the night.

Mr. LUCAS. I merely wish to ask one question before the Senator yields the floor.

I have listened for 2 days now to the debates upon the constitutionality of the Trade Agreements Act. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he agrees with me that after we strip the frills from the amendment which is now before the Senate which, as I understand, is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] seeking to have the trade agreements ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate—the sole question comes down to whether or not the trade agreements are agreements or treaties, one or the other.

Mr. GEORGE. In my opinion, yes.

Mr. LUCAS. And, as I understand, the Senator from Georgia takes the position that they are not treaties, but they are merely trade agreements.

Mr. GEORGE. They are Executive agreements on the one side, as distinguished from treaties. They are instruments falling below the level of a treaty.

Mr. LUCAS. If, on the other hand, they are treaties, as contended for by the Senator from Nevada—who seeks through this amendment to have them ratified by a two-thirds majority of the Senate—then the question of the delegation of power from the legislative branch to the Executive, as so ably argued by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], is not involved at all.

Mr. GEORGE. No; if the instruments are to be treated as treaties, of course they have to be ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and no question of delegation of power is involved, because we could not restrict the President. He is free to do as he pleases, of course.

Mr. LUCAS. Then if the Senator from Georgia is correct that these instruments are purely trade agreements and not treaties, the only question which the Senate has to deal with is solely with respect to the delegation of power, and the safeguards surrounding that delegation.

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If, on the other hand, the contention of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] were correct, and it were considered that these agreements are treaties, then this whole act would be in limitation and in derogation of the constitutional authority of the President to negotiate treaties; would it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Entirely.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In other words, under the Constitution the President does not need any statutory authority from us. He may go ahead and negotiate any treaty on the face of the earth that he pleases, and send it to the Senate for ratification, and he does not need any statute of this sort; and, as a matter of fact, the whole nature of this statute would be a limitation on his constitutional authority.

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. President, I have concluded what I wished to say, although I have not covered all the ground I desired to cover on the question of the nature of the Trade Agreements Act, and the things done thereunder; that is, whether a trade agreement is a treaty or whether it is a mere Executive agreement. The important question in this matter, as I see it, is whether the Trade Agreements Act constitutes an unlawful or unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the President in negotiating a treaty.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be glad to yield. I was about to yield the floor for the day.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to compliment the Senator from Georgia upon his address on this very important question. I have listened to it with a great deal of interest, and I do not think I have ever heard a more eloquent or more persuasive address on this very important subject.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] were agreed to by the Senate, is it the opinion of the Senator from Georgia that that might preclude the possibility of arranging effective trade agreements between the United States and other countries in the immediate future?

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly, in my opinion, it would preclude the possibility of doing anything.

Mr. BARKLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask the distinguished leader on this side if we may not recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I think it would be very desirable to do so. Has the Senator from Georgia concluded his remarks?

Mr. GEORGE. There is one phase of the matter which I should like to cover in the morning. It will not take very long, I hope.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was asking merely for information. It is entirely agreeable to me to have the Senate meet at 11 o'clock, and I have conferred with Senators on the other side on the subject.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I understand what the request is?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asked me if it would be agreeable to have the Senate recess until 11 o'clock in the morning instead of 12 noon, and I said it would be.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do.

Mr. AUSTIN. It had been my intention to take the floor following the distinguished Senator from Georgia, whose address I have listened to without interrupting him, and with great admiration for his able presentation of his views relating to the pending amendment. I give notice that I shall try to obtain the floor after the Senator from Georgia shall have concluded his address tomorrow.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was about to remark that there are so few Senators upon the floor at this moment that it may be difficult to ascertain whether or not 11 o'clock would be a convenient time for Senators to meet. Most of those who have departed undoubtedly have gone in the belief that the Senate would not assemble until noon.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Wyoming will recall that yesterday we discussed the feasibility and advisability of meeting at 11 o'clock today.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator was very courteous to me in not having that done, because it would have been inconvenient for me to proceed with my remarks at 11 o'clock today.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only committee which is to be in session tomorrow, I understand, is the Appropriations Committee. I have conferred with some members of that committee, and have been told that to have the Senate meet at 11 o'clock would not work any great inconvenience to them. They are close to the Senate Chamber, anyway; and inasmuch as it is desired to obtain a vote on this amendment this week, if possible on Friday, so that we may then know what the future course of the joint resolution will be, it has been thought desirable to have the Senate meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow. I hope the Senator will not object to that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have no objection.

PAYMENTS BY RURAL ELECTRIC COOPERATIVES

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in view of certain remarks made a few days ago by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] that there was not a rural electrification association in the United States which had earned the interest on the repayments it had to make to the Government of the United States, I send to the desk a telegram from one of these organizations which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

OWENSBORO, KY., March 22, 1940.

Senator ALBEN BARKLEY,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We deeply resent the remarks made by Senator Taft about R. E. A. as quoted in today's paper. We suggest he acquaint himself with the facts before again making such unfair accusation about a matter so close to the heart of the American farmer. Here are a few facts about the Green River Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation of Owensboro, Ky., serving five counties. Fifteen months after energizing we paid $10,000 of principal and $7,000 of interest not due and have met every interest and principal payment each month since and have a sizable fund in the bank besides. After meeting all operating expenses and all interest charges 34 percent of our monthly collects are available for amortizing our loan. If the Senator wants proof these figures are on file with the R. E. A. Administration, Washington.

Sincerely,

HOWARD DANIEL,
President, Green River Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. AUSTIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say that since the colloquy occurred last week in regard to this subject, I have made an effort to secure a statement of the facts from rural electrification associations, and I hope to be ready to submit some data covering the subject at an early date, when I can get the floor without conflicting with the pending business. I could be ready tomorrow if I could get the floor, but I do not desire to interfere with the debate on the trade-agreements measure. At the first opportunity after the pending bill shall have been disposed of I will submit the facts to the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am sure that the Senate will be glad to have the Senator's presentation. I have had this telegram read, because it is brief, and it states the facts as to the particular situation covered by the message.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator had it read.

Mr. BARKLEY. Did the Senator from Vermont desire to ask me a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. I did not realize that the Senator from Ohio had come into the Chamber during the colloquy.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may say to the Senator from Ohio that I feel confident he will have all the facts he has been desirous of obtaining.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I hope the Senator will have the facts as to the 800 rural electrification cooperatives, so that we may know the whole situation, and not merely as related to 1 out of 800.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will have reports from all of them.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 27, 1940

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. Joseph Coleman Richards, D. D., pastor of the Pleasant Ridge Methodist Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

Infinite Father, Thou who art the ruler of the world's destiny, we worship Thee for the wonder and glory of life, and for its terror also; because we have learned that beneath its hurt and heartache there is a wise love that never fails, never forgets, never forsakes. Earnestly we would seek Thee this day, beseeching Thee to be the spirit of our prayer, the leader of our thoughts, and the consolation of our hearts. Open our minds we humbly pray, purify our hearts, grant us eyes to see Thy truth wherever it is unveiled, and ears to hear all voices that speak to us concerning Thy will and way for us. Admit us, O Lord, if we be worthy, into the communion of vision that we may be sure of Thy truth—seeing it clearly and with honest hearts—sure of the moral order of the world, and surer of the life eternal which flashes in the dreams of great and pure minds. Forgive our sins, heal our sorrows, and so cleanse our prayer that it may lead us in that noble and faithful service of our fellow souls wherein lieth our nearest duty and our truest joy. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 39. Concurrent resolution extending the time for the submittal of the report of the Joint Committee on Forestry.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1955) entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to delegate certain regulatory functions, and to create the position of Second Assistant Secretary of Agriculture."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CALDWELL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 9109) making appropriations for the Government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1886), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEFAN reserved all points of order on the bill.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, according to the Townsend organization, H. R. 8264 represents the present ideas of the Townsend clubs. They represent to the people of the country that under it there would be paid to everyone over 60 years of age from $60 to $200 each, per month.

Assuming that the enormous tax collected would not reduce the volume of business, the greatest amount that could be paid to each pensioner over 60 years of age would be $12.25 per month. The probabilities are that the tax would slow business down and reduce the volume of gross income and that each pension would soon be less than $12.25 per month.

The bill proposes a 2-percent tax on gross incomes but provides an exemption of $3,000 per year. In other words, if a man receives a salary of $3,000 per year, he pays no tax; if a merchant has gross sales of $20,000 and has a net profit of 7½ percent, or $1,500, after taking out an exemption of $3,000 on his gross income, he would pay 2 percent on $17,000, or $340. In this particular case the man with an income of $3,000 in salary would pay no tax, while a man with a net income of $1,500 in a business would pay $340, or 22½ percent upon his net income.

Senator DOWNEY, one of the joint authors of the bill, engaged in a discussion of it in Washington on Sunday, February 25, 1940, in the American Forum of the Air. His talk appears in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the particular part of it to which I wish to refer appears on page 1425. Senator DOWNEY states that the gross income of the United States would be about $300,000,000,000.

Now, it appears that only 30 percent of the gross income is received by individuals and corporations whose gross income exceeds $3,000 a year. This means that a total of $90,000,000,000 would be earned by those who were subject to tax. It is estimated by the Bureau of Internal Revenue that 3,500,000 earners, both individuals and corporations, earned this amount. Therefore, the exemption would be $3,000 multiplied by 3,500,000, or $10,500,000,000. This would leave an amount subject to the 2-percent tax of $79,500,000,000, and 2 percent on this amount is $1,590,000,000, from which we would have to deduct the expense of collection and operation of the act, which at the very least would be $120,000,000, which would leave the sum of $1,470,000,000 available to the pensioners. Under the proposed bill this amount would be distributed equally.

Senator DOWNEY claims that there are 10,000,000 people who would qualify for this pension. This would mean $147 per year, or $12.25 a month to each pensioner. In other words, taking the figures offered to us by the advocates of the bill and nothing else, and using a pencil and paper to figure it out, we find that adding practically $1,600,000,000 to the taxes of the country would only result in the payment of $12.25 to each individual pensioner. Instead of meaning less taxes, it would mean more taxes. The present pay-roll taxes upon business have operated to stifle and prevent recovery. These new Townsend taxes—double the old-age annuity pay-roll taxes—would have no other effect than to make business worse. They would stifle and interfere with real estate transactions and would seriously interfere with the marketability of stocks and bonds. Its general effect would be very serious, and the benefits to the individuals would not exceed $12.25 a month. These same people have been deceived by promoters into believing that the bill would yield them from $60 to $200 a month each.

I am not going into an analysis in this statement of other bills that have been introduced by the same organization. I am simply going to say that none of these bills would have worked out as the Townsend promoters stated.

I doubt very much the ability of the people in this country under 60 years of age to pay taxes enough to provide a substantial pension to those over 60. Except in case of actual disability, I think that all old-age pensions must be limited to those above 65 years of age, and I think that it is absolutely impossible to tax the people of this country enough to pay the same pension to those in the South, where the cost of living is lower, that we pay to those in the North.

These Townsend taxes would either raise prices or drive more people out of business, and in that way they would bear most heavily on the poor.

I do not propose to support any measure that is very evidently designed to deceive the people and to get money out of them, rather than to accomplish the purpose that they pretend to stand for.

A little later on, as the opportunity comes, I propose to discuss the entire social-security problem and to make such constructive proposals with reference to that problem as are possible. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD and to insert a table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and at the conclusion of the legislative business in order for the day and after any other previous orders heretofore entered I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in my reply to the gentleman from New York the other day, I got consent to revise and extend my remarks and I desire to insert some data which I think I have a right to include, but for fear I might be mistaken I ask unanimous consent to include it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what data does the gentleman wish to insert in the RECORD?

Mr. RANKIN. Relative to power rates in the State of New York.

Mr. RICH. I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi when he puts these articles and tables in the RECORD and he states he is the author of them I wonder when he has the opportunity to do it. Because he puts so many tables and articles in the RECORD.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say to the gentleman that I have devoted a great deal of time to getting up and compiling this information. It is accurate, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. If I have to take information from the statements that the gentleman from Mississippi puts in the RECORD I do not want very much of it. Because he is badly guided and misinformed by someone and I am wondering who it might be.

Mr. RANKIN. I know the gentleman does not want information on this subject.

Mr. RICH. I want information that is authentic and I am not interested in putting the Government in business. I want to keep the Government out of business that competes with its citizens. The gentleman from Mississippi is interested in having the Government get into all kinds of business. That is a revolution, I will admit, from our customs. He quotes from the T. V. A., a corporation owned and operated by the Federal Government. The Federal Government pays the taxes, pays for the investment, and gives the people of Mississippi electric power for less than it costs the Federal Government, which sets up the Corporation for the benefit of Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee, and the Government provides 45 percent of the money in Mississippi for electric appliances then the people go and borrow the other 55 percent from Government agencies and everything is done down in the gentleman's State at the cost of the taxpayers of Pennsylvania and my district and the other States. I object to such procedure. I think it is unfair, unethical, illogical, and dishonest. The gentleman is trying to get money out of the Federal Government for the benefit of only his people at the expense of mine. If he continues, his people down there will not amount to a tinker's darn, if they have to live completely off the Treasury of the Federal Government. He ought to teach them to work. He should be trying to get them to be independent instead of being dependent.

Mr. RANKIN. As I said, the information may not do the gentleman from Pennsylvania any good, but I think it will help the rest of the House and the country.

Mr. RICH. If it will help anybody, we will be glad to see it, but I want to see some things done that will help the country pretty soon instead of the people of the entire country taking care of the people of Mississippi. Where the utilities pay no tax, that the Government operate, such as the T. V. A.

Mr. RANKIN. It is helping the power consumers of Pennsylvania in getting reductions in their light and power rates, in spite of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if they do something in Mississippi at the cost of the people of Mississippi, we do not object to it, but I do object to our people in Pennsylvania supporting in full all the people of Mississippi; they should do something for themselves.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

LABOR-SECURITY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9007) making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9007, with Mr. BUCK in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. At the conclusion of the session on yesterday the Clerk had read through line 12, on page 14 of the bill.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts: On page 14, line 9, strike out "$4,830,000" and insert "$5,865,000."

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered at this time is simply to restore the Budget figure for salaries of employees of the Wage and Hour Division. It is of tremendous importance because, ordinarily, a reduction in an appropriation means merely that the organization which suffers the reduction should tighten its belt and go on and adjust itself to the reduction, but right here I want to make it plain that the vote upon this amendment is a vote either for the Wage and Hour Act or against it. I cannot make this too plain. I say it because the Wage and Hour Division is engaged in the enforcement of wages and hours in industries throughout the United States. Colonel Fleming himself is the authority for the statement that if it is not efficiently and effectively enforced, it ought to go off the books. Let me repeat that—if his law is not efficiently and effectively enforced, it ought to go off the books.

If you allow this cut to go through and not pass my amendment, you are going to cut the contemplated personnel by one-third. It will be impossible to enforce wages and hours. The law will be inefficiently enforced, sloppily enforced, it will fall of its own weight and the enemies of wages and hours will rejoice. But make no mistake. Do not comfort yourselves with the idea, "Well, I favor the wage and hour principle, but in this instance the appropriation is more than last year and therefore I will vote for the reduction rather than to put back the Budget estimate."

Because the Appropriations Committee proposes to reduce the appropriation recommended by the President for the Wage and Hour Division by $1,346,400—20 percent of the total amount recommended by the President, which was $7,486,000. This would reduce the recommended appropriation for salaries by $1,035,000.

This would be a crippling reduction. The Division is now operating on the basis of annual expenditures of $7,716,000. Moreover, when the Wage and Hour Division appeared before the Appropriations Subcommittee of the House in July 1939 to ask for additional sums in the deficiency bill, the statement was made, and apparently was understood, as appears in the record, from both sides, that the rate of expenditure at the beginning of the fiscal year 1941, by reason of appropriations then made, would be annually $7,716,000; that is, that the money which was available for the fiscal year 1940, through the regular and deficiency appropriations, would be spent in increasing amounts each month so that in the final month of that year and the first month of 1941 the annual rate of expenditure would be $7,716,000. Consequently, the appropriation recommended by the President is $230,000 less than the annual rate that was contemplated last July.

The proposed reduction in the amount recommended by the President would mean a reduction in the inspection force of 350 men—more than a third of the total inspection staff contemplated. In addition a very substantial number of attorneys in Washington and in the field must be discharged or furloughed without pay.

The results of such reductions on inspection are obvious. With the enforcement staff so reduced it will be simply impossible for the Division to achieve adequate enforcement. Inadequate enforcement means nonuniform discriminatory enforcement. Employers who have been voluntarily complying with the labor standards prescribed by the act will be subjected to price competition by chiselers whom the Division will be powerless to bring to book. As a result of this situation noncompliance could be expected to spread like fire or pestilence. It would become too unprofitable to comply and too easy to violate.

The only motive disclosed by the committee for making this drastic reduction is found in a unique statement on page 13 of the committee report:

The committee recognize the necessity for some expansion in the work of the Wage and Hour Division as it develops its organization and proceeds with its program of properly policing the industries that fall within the terms of the act. They do feel, however, that until Congress shall adopt legislation amendatory of the Fair Labor Standards Act which will serve to clarify certain ambiguities in the existing law, and until those charged with the administration of the act have been able to bring about simplification of procedure, and clarification in the interpretation of the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to any such amendatory legislation, it would be improvident on the part of Congress to approve a greatly enlarged administrative set-up that could only serve in lending further difficulties to an already confused administrative problem.

This is tantamount to a statement by the Appropriations Committee that they will refuse to recommend sufficient funds to enforce legislation enacted by Congress unless and until it is amended to the committee's satisfaction.

Except in minor particulars the act is not ambiguous. The drafters of this statement are not worried about ambiguities. They are attempting to coerce amendments which would exempt over 1,000,000 sweated workers who are now clearly included in the benefits of the act.

I say to you that the issue is plain, and I want to talk to my Republican brethren on this side of the House, the gentlemen who believe in a living wage, the gentlemen who believe in decent, American working conditions, the gentlemen who believe in protecting the high-type American manufacturers. You ought to vote for my amendment, and let only those who believe in the opposite of that vote against it. You cannot comfort yourselves on this side by saying, "It is a Democratic reform bill and we are going to rejoice in the fact it is going to be inefficiently enforced; that it will give us political capital," because we should not make ducks and drakes of such an important measure that means so much in the lives of the men who labor and the manufacturers who employ labor. What happens is this. You have in an industry a man who is obeying this law and you have in the same industry a man who is a chiseler and does not want to obey the law. What great comfort he will take from the fact it cannot be enforced. The decent, law-abiding manufacturer is going to obey this law, whether it is enforced or not, as long as it is on the books, but the chiseler or the profiteer, the one who will take comfort out of employing people at 10 or 12 cents per hour—and this is being done—will slip by because it is being inefficiently enforced. You are giving comfort to the chiseler, you are giving comfort to the type of manufacturer who should be punished, by not appropriating the amount asked for by the Budget and by the President.

I say to you that the issue is plain and it is this. If you want wages and hours, if you believe in the philosophy of a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours, you will vote to put back the Budget figure and the President's figure. [Applause.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment, reluctantly. I voted for the creation of the Wage and Hour Act, and I am for it today, and if I thought for a moment that the disapproval of this amendment would effectively imperil the efficiency of the Wage and Hour Division, I would support the amendment. I do not believe it is necessary to send an army of inspectors all over the entire United States to police industry, when only 7 percent of the industries of the country are complained against. Furthermore, I do not believe it is essential to have an army of inspectors at this time, until the Congress itself has the courage to sit down in a legislative committee—and I am speaking for myself alone, and not the Appropriations Committee—such as the Labor Committee of the House, and define what the area of production is. The way it is today, there is great confusion all over the country. Nobody seems to be able to tell what the area of production is; certainly not Congress, nor the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division. At one time it was said that it was from Maine to Ohio.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. How would the gentleman define the area of production? What does the gentleman mean? Has the gentleman anything in mind?

Mr. HOUSTON. When this bill was passed by the House and the Senate, it went to conference. The bill was rewritten in conference, and in that conference there was inserted in the bill the item "area of production." It has never been clearly defined by the Congress; it is left to the Administrator, and they, themselves down there, are confused upon it, and until such time as the Congress sits down and defines what it is, we shall always be in a state of confusion.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. How many industries are there in the United States to which the wage and hour law would apply?

Mr. HOUSTON. About 259,000.

Mr. KELLER. How much would 7 percent of that be?

Mr. HOUSTON. It would be 7 percent of that amount.

Mr. KELLER. About 17,500?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. How many men does the gentleman think it would take to investigate 17,500 businesses intelligently during the period of 1 year?

Mr. HOUSTON. I agree with the gentleman to this extent: That I think complaint cases should be investigated, and our objective is to work toward routine inspection; but I call your attention to one item here in the hearings, on page 346, where the gentleman from Georgia, Judge TARVER, asked these questions, and the replies which were given by Colonel Fleming:

Mr. TARVER. I notice, for example, that during the next fiscal year you have 32 inspectors for location at Charlotte, N. C. My recollection is that in the evidence last year it was indicated the purpose was to have, during the fiscal year 1940, 74 inspectors located at that office. How many have been in fact located there during the present fiscal year?

Colonel FLEMING. We now have at Charlotte 1 supervising inspector and 12 inspectors.

Mr. TARVER. There is, then, no necessity for stationing an extremely large number of inspectors which I mentioned, 74, at Charlotte for the present fiscal year?

Colonel FLEMING. It so happens you have selected a region which is a little different than all other regions, in that we have recently entered into an agreement, which is permitted under our act, with the State of North Carolina whereby they are undertaking our inspection work for us there, using inspectors of their own department of labor, supplemented by others whom we pay for.

It should be remembered that these hearings were held only about 2 or 3 weeks ago.

They are allowing States to do that and paying for it with Federal funds.

Mr. KELLER. That is in one State?

Mr. HOUSTON. No; in others.

Mr. KELLER. In what States?

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, in Minnesota and Wisconsin and others.

Mr. KELLER. Nevertheless, if the amount were provided, they would not be able to do the work, even with all of it.

Mr. HOUSTON. As a matter of fact, they have not assigned the number of inspectors that they have been authorized to appoint and have appropriations for under the present law and for the present fiscal year.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman knows the reason for that, does he not?

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, I understand that the Civil Service Commission is slow. I cannot yield any further.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Is it true or not that in the case where the State law-enforcing officers carry on for the Wage and Hour Division the State is reimbursed for the salaries of those people?

Mr. HOUSTON. They are reimbursed by the Federal Government.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Then the expense might be just as great in one case as in the other.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not necessarily because after a man has been trained and put into the work you can eliminate the traveling expenses.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. What is the amount of this appropriation as compared with the appropriation for the same item last year?

Mr. HOUSTON. The entire thing?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. No; on this particular item involved in this amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. We are increasing the appropriation by $1,576,000 over last year.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. A million and a half?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; more than that. On page 44 of the report there is a comparative statement made.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. One million five hundred and seventy-six thousand dollars?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is correct.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. That is an increase over what is being spent this year, but there is a reduction of more than a million dollars in the amount recommended by the Budget?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is correct for the entire item.

Mr. THOMASON. In the RECORD of yesterday, at page 3467, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] inserted a statement, which he says came from the Wage and Hour Division, in which he says it will be necessary to discharge a large number of employees. Immediately following the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] was a speech made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER], in which he concludes with these words:

It would be very apparent to anyone who reads the hearings with a desire to find out what the true facts may be that there is not only not any reduction of personnel in the employment contemplated by the provisions contained in the pending bill, but that the appropriations contained in the bill will be sufficient to very considerably enlarge the existing personnel.

Now, what is the truth about that? Are we going to have a lot of employees discharged, or is the chairman of your subcommittee right when he says there will be none discharged? That is what I want to know.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to know how any employees could be discharged when we have given them $1,644,000 more than they have during the current year. They might discharge some, but others will be engaged to take their places, and if the committee recommendation is approved by the House 744 additional jobs will be created. I now call your attention to page 400 of the hearings on the area-of-production item. I ask you to read the discussion before the committee on that subject.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we cannot agree on a limitation of time on this matter. We had considerable discussion of this item yesterday. I am sure the House wants to consider the matter fully. May I submit a request that in addition to the debate already had this morning we have 20 minutes of additional debate?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Let me submit this request, Mr. Chairman, that we have 30 minutes' additional debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be limited to 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Reserving the right to object, may I say to the Chairman, who I know has been very fair and generous throughout this debate, that yesterday many of us would like to have taken part in this particular discussion when the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] offered an amendment, but, unfortunately, the time was limited then. This is one of the most controversial items in the bill, and all the Members requesting time now should at least be given 5 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. The time limitation was had yesterday by unanimous consent.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is right. I am not complaining about that.

Mr. TARVER. I have no desire to try to foreclose reasonable debate, but there are several controversial items in the bill. Another bill is coming up tomorrow, so it is absolutely necessary to finish today, if possible.

Mr. Chairman, I submit this amended request—that the debate be limited to 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amended request?

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this affects my particular district and is of utmost importance. I think that sufficient time should be allowed, so that I at least will be granted 5 minutes to be heard.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman I have exhausted every means to reach an agreement with the Members with reference to debate on this matter. So I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 1 hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 1 hour.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is recognized for 3½ minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I come from one of the great industrial centers of this country, St. Louis. I have not as yet received what I feel is one legitimate objection to the Wage and Hour Act as a whole, nor have I heard one legitimate objection from any section of the country to the administration of that act. True I have letters, inspired propaganda, against any form of wage and hour legislation but none advocated a legitimate objection. Now, remember this amendment is simply to restore the figure submitted by the President through the Bureau of the Budget.

It is no crime to ask to restore an amount recommended by a House committee. That committee is simply the agents of the House. They recommend, the House approves or rejects.

The first Administrator made an excellent record.

The present Administrator is likewise making an excellent record. All I ask is to give him a fair chance to do what you said you wanted done when you passed the law.

This is a new law. Why was it enacted? It was enacted to do away with the chiseler and the sweatshops and to give legitimate business an equal opportunity with those who followed unethical business methods in dealing with their employees and in production. Its enactment was advocated after the Supreme Court held the N. R. A. unconstitutional. I bow to the decision of the Court but I challenge anyone to say the N. R. A. was not beneficial to business as well as to the wage earner. The little-business man especially suffered by this ruling of the Court.

I understand that many of the arguments advanced by employers are being settled across the table. In other words, a real determined effort is being made to make this new law work. I am not speaking for jobs, I am speaking for proper enforcement of a good law and I do not want to see the intent of Congress destroyed by failure to properly provide the machinery to carry out the provisions of this act.

As I said, this is a new law. Anyone will admit that from time to time it is necessary to perfect a new law, and when experience has shown that amendments to this law will be beneficial to the employer and employee, then I think the Congress will respond and pass the necessary amendments.

I am just as much for economy as anyone in this body, but I do not believe in destroying progressive legislation by failing to appropriate sufficient money to properly administer the law. If this law is not properly administered, it will be due solely to the failure of the Congress to provide the proper and necessary tools to do the job. We were liberal at the outset, but as it became necessary to build up, to investigate and consider complaints, naturally there must be expansion.

We have one organization where the personnel is being blamed today for the manner in which the law has been administered. No such complaints come to us with reference to the administration of this act.

I have never been in the Wage and Hour office but once, and that was on a legal holiday. The one man that I saw working there was the attorney who was attacked on this floor the other day, one of the most brilliant young lawyers who has ever worked for this Government.

I was at my office and received a telegram urging me to send by air mail a copy of a decision of the Administrator. I called the office and an attorney answered, saying while the office was closed, still he would be there for the day, and said if I could call he would give me his copy and would replace it the following day. When I called I met the assistant to the general counsel, Mr. Rauh. He has charge of the opinion section of the Legal Division. I was rather surprised when I read in the hearings how critical some had been of this young man. True, he is a young man; but if they had looked into his background they would have found, young as he is, his brilliant record does not warrant criticism. He graduated from Harvard in 1935 at the head of his class. He improved his legal education during the period he was law clerk to Justice Cardozo, of the United States Supreme Court. After the death of Justice Cardozo he became associated with the National Power Policy Committee, and while in that position he was called upon and assigned to assist Judge Calvert Magruder, then the general counsel of the Wage and Hour Division, prepare the regulations. Mr. Rauh was drafted to help get the act in operation. He was not on the Wage and Hour pay roll. So exceptional was his work, about a year after he was offered and accepted a position with the Wage and Hour Division. Colonel Fleming, in defending the appointment and service of Mr. Rauh, called attention to outstanding generals in our Army who were less than 30 years of age when they reached the grade. He insisted there are individuals who at a young age are competent to hold responsible jobs. I agree with him fully in this case. The day I called on Mr. Rauh was the only time I ever contacted him, but I have looked into his record and service and commend those who were responsible for assigning him to this important post.

Let us not cloud the issue before the House at the moment. Remember this is not an increase over Budget figures, but is to make the bill carry the amount the President says is necessary for proper administration. I sincerely hope the amendment is adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in a very embarrassing position. The time has been apportioned among the 16 gentlemen who were on their feet at the time the debate was limited to 1 hour.

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, there has already been much debate on the Labor Department-Federal Security Agency 1941 appropriation bill. At this time I only wish to discuss three items, those relating to the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department, the National Youth Administration of the Federal Security Agency, and the National Labor Relations Board. I shall deal briefly with each.

The first item I shall examine relates to the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department. The Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted to protect the workers of this country from being underpaid and overworked by unfair employers, thus injuring workers, fair-minded employers, and the prosperity of our country. We all know that when labor is exploited in this way society must bear the burden of making up the difference between low wages paid and the minimum necessary for bare existence.

The Fourteenth Congressional District of New York is primarily a district inhabited by those who earn their living by physical labor. In the many tenements to be found in that district, women and children for many years have supplemented low family incomes by doing industrial home work. Instead of being able to play in the streets, children have stayed in the dark, unhealthy tenements working long hours on the making of artificial flowers, feathers, and various types of ornaments. All this heavy and confining work has resulted in an income of only a few cents a day for each worker. The bill the community has had to pay for this industrial home work has been a heavy one. It has meant a deprivation of the right of children to grow up as normal Americans. It has meant a heavy health bill for the city and State. It also has meant that those employers engaged in the same line of endeavor, using modern sanitary factories, paying decent wages for a reasonable number of hours per week, were placed at a disadvantage against their unfair competitors. It meant that eventually those employers, despite their best intentions and their desires to do what was right, would be forced to change over to the other type of production.

All this has been ended by the Fair Labor Standards Act. That act was a declaration by Congress that industry in this country would operate on the single standard and not a double standard. It has meant that the people of my district engaged in certain lines of work for which there is no union protection as yet, have been brought under the shield of minimum standards as to hours and wages set up by this act. It has meant for the children of my district who were forced to aid in industrial home work the end of a system imposed only because of economic necessity.

That is what the declaration contained in the Fair Labor Standards Act has meant to them. All this, however, is only a promise. The reality is yet to be accomplished. This can only be done by a fair but vigorous enforcement of the various provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. If we do not appropriate enough funds so the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department can maintain its present staff of inspectors and increase them in order to cope with the duties required of them by this act, the promise will remain a vision never to be realized.

In the light of this situation, let us see what appropriations were requested for enforcement of this act for the coming fiscal year. The Wage and Hour Division asked for $6,185,000 and got $5,105,000 for salaries and expenses. In my opinion, in view of the task which confronts the Wage and Hour Division, this sum is far from adequate. This House in considering various appropriation bills has been plunged into an atmosphere of economy. I do not believe that reasons of economy are sufficient to justify what the Appropriations Committee has done.

The committee report at page 13 gives the following reasons for allowing less than the amount requested:

> The committee recognize the necessity for some expansion in the work of the Wage and Hour Division as it develops its organization and proceeds with its program of properly policing the industries that fall within the terms of the act. They do feel, however, that until Congress shall adopt legislation amendatory of the Fair Labor Standards Act which will serve to clarify certain ambiguities in the existing law, and until those charged with the administration of the act have been able to bring about simplification of procedure, and clarification in the interpretation of the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to any such amendatory legislation, it would be improvident on the part of Congress to approve a greatly enlarged administrative set-up that could only serve in lending further difficulties to an already confused administrative problem.
> The present Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division has been but recently confirmed in his office. The committee are confident that he will satisfactorily work out means and methods of administering this act that will be in conformity with elements of reasonableness and good judgment. The committee further know it is the intention of the present Administrator to build up the enlarged organization in a slow and methodical manner in order that a real selective and efficient personnel may be acquired.

Even the hasty reader can easily see that the cut in this item would frustrate the purpose of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The objection that Colonel Fleming has only recently been confirmed cannot be intended as a statement that he does not know what the Division is all about. He has been on the job ever since Commissioner Andrews left.

At page 341 of the committee hearings, Colonel Fleming said as to the 1941 estimates:

> I think I should say, first of all, while this is an apparent increase over last year, it is really not an actual one.

Colonel Fleming then pointed out that in July 1939 it was understood that by the end of the present fiscal year, the annual rate of expenditure would be $7,716,000. The estimate was for $7,486,000. Colonel Fleming never indicated that a lesser appropriation would be satisfactory to him.

I believe that too often legislation has been destroyed by cutting down appropriations to carry out the law. The amount reported out by the committee, in the face of Colonel Fleming's statement, at page 345 of the committee hearings, that the Budget estimate will do only 70 percent of the job, with only incidental routine inspections, is clearly subject to this charge. The committee is to be commended for its effort to save $11,000,000 from the Budget estimate but I cannot approve this saving. Instead of waiting for the Senate to correct this mistaken economy, we should do so.

As I have already stated, my district has a very vital interest in this matter since a large part of my constituency is employed in industries affected by the Wage and Hour Act. If adequate funds are not provided for the proper enforcement of this act at this time, a psychology of noncompliance will be set up in business which will make enforcement, when it is attempted, extremely difficult. The promise of betterment held out by this act, to underpaid and overworked employees will be only an empty promise, never to be fulfilled.

There is another consideration involved which, while secondary, is still important. According to Colonel Fleming's statement at page 340, the Division and the Appropriations Committee mutually understood in July 1939 that expenditures would be at about $7,716,000 annually by this June. Increases in personnel were made on this understanding. This recruiting program involved expense in the selection and training of these new employees. The reduction in the appropriation will require the dismissal of many of these employees. The expense incurred in hiring them will have been wasted and the morale of these employees will be seriously injured. They will be discharged, or shall I say "furloughed" through no fault of their own and even though the Government actually stands in need of their services. The reduction of this appropriation proceeds along no scientific lines of personnel management. It has no real relation to economy. It simply expresses dissatisfaction with legislation enacted by this Congress.

The appropriation for the National Youth Administration of the Federal Security Agency once more calls to mind that one-third of our unemployed come from the youth of this country. Experts and Dorothy Thompson may differ as to the extent of unemployment today, but however they resolve their dispute, this body cannot afford to ignore the existence of our 4,000,000 young people, ranging in age from 18 to 24, who are unemployed and who want to work. The National Youth Administration is an effort to ameliorate their plight. I cannot conceive it to be a solution of their problems. Nevertheless, it is better than nothing and I regard it as a disastrous mistake for this House to agree to the curtailment of N. Y. A. activities in any way, and they are limited enough even now. Last year, before I was a Member of Congress, N. Y. A. was given over $100,000,000. For the coming fiscal year we are only allowing it $85,000,000. Is the need any less than before? No one has said that it is and all evidence points to a contrary conclusion. Shall we go along with the Appropriations Committee because it chooses to go along with the Budget Bureau? The answer is obvious. One Member of this House has charged it with saving blood money. I do not think that is an overstatement.

We are dealing here in millions of dollars, but concretely what does the N. Y. A. program mean? It means aid in many ways for American youth at a minimum cost to this country. Remember, if the school program of N. Y. A. were to cease, almost half a million students would be forced onto our overglutted labor market. The meager average stipend of $4.41 per month for 300,000 high-school students over 16, and $12.59 per month for 117,000 college students for work profitable to themselves and their schools, keeps them in school.

In New York City almost 13,000 high-school students and 4,311 college students in 200 schools and 54 colleges were given part-time N. Y. A. work which enabled them to remain in school so that they could benefit not only themselves, but our country. The total funds allotted to New York City for the current fiscal year were a little over $5,000,000. Two-thirds of this sum went to the work program and only one-third to the school program. Think of it, for only $1,665,000, 23,000 young people were enabled to stay in school for 1 year.

The cut in this year's appropriation will require a reduction of the program by one-sixth. This means that in the next school year over 57,000 high-school students will be forced out of schools to hunt for jobs that do not exist. Twenty-one thousand college students who would otherwise achieve their goal of higher education will achieve only heartbreak instead. They will become fertile soil for the unrest and disaffection which "isms" seek to implant in order to destroy democracy.

The lower East Side of New York City has long realized that the salvation of its youth lay in higher education. No sacrifice was too great to obtain knowledge that would be the open sesame to security. Today no sacrifice avails to achieve that end. There are few enough from my district who can afford to go even to the free colleges New York City provides. That small number have been materially aided by N. Y. A. assistance.

Six hundred and three students at Brooklyn College received N. Y. A. aid. One thousand one hundred and twenty-eight received similar aid at City College, 700 at Hunter College, 110 at Queens College. The money paid to these students is not a dole but compensation for work that they have done which has benefited their schools. I know that the president of each of these free colleges, if asked, would assure this body that the N. Y. A. program has been of inestimable benefit to their institutions in getting work accomplished for which they had no funds, as well as aiding students, most of whom rank high in scholarship. Pass this bill as it stands, at $85,000,000, and you deprive them of the right to go to school and college, to acquire a vocation or a profession.

N. Y. A. also has a program for youth out of school. Four million youth are unemployed. With this year's appropriation 322,000 were given aid at an average salary of $15.09 per month, with a minimum of $12 for 40 hours' work per month. A reduction of one-sixth will mean that 45,000 of these next year will be left without hope when there are 300,000 already certified as being eligible for N. Y. A. work projects and at least 2,000,000 who would be if adequate funds were given to N. Y. A.

An N. Y. A. project is no sinecure and it pays no princely wages. It provides useful work and training for the unskilled so that they will have a better chance to obtain private employment. The monthly turn-over is about 9 percent, so that on the average each project annually has a complete change in its workers. About one-third of N. Y. A. workers find jobs in private industry and the other two-thirds wish they could.

The achievements of N. Y. A. under this aspect of its program have been of material value to those engaged in its work projects and those public agencies which have sponsored them. In New York City last month almost 11,000 people from 18 to 24 were engaged in various sorts of useful work. One thousand seven hundred and seventy-six helped construct and preserve various types of minor recreational facilities. Almost 4,000 were employed on clerical and service projects. Over 3,500 acted as leaders for community recreational activities. Four hundred were engaged in making useful articles in workshops established to provide training for those who were unskilled. Five hundred were employed as assistants for public-health work, library work, and other work of a professional nature. Seven hundred were employed in preparing and serving lunches to needy school children, conducting nursery schools and acting as homemakers. The diversification of projects is even greater outside of New York City.

With $100,000,000, only 322,000 young people out of work could be given N. Y. A. work and training. The other 3,678,000 were left out in the cold. Dare we add to that number by cutting that appropriation still further to $85,000,000? I dare not. I shall vote for $85,000,000 only when I realize that economy—false economy—trafficking with the lives of our youth, refuses to squeeze out any more from the Budget for their salvation and that of our country.

If we let our youth go their way, unaided by us, their way will be the way of youth in other lands which have succumbed to dictatorship. If we do not provide for them by democratic means, they will throw away their birthright of democracy for the security, slavery, and militarization of the labor battalions. Erika Mann, daughter of Thomas Mann, noted German exile, in speaking of the importance of the Hitler youth organization, has well said: "Who has the youth—of a nation—behind him has all."

The issue before us is not economy but democracy, the maintenance of America and real Americanism, as against a saving of $15,000,000. We have heard much of 100-percent Americanism. We can show ours by voting 100 percent for a 100-percent appropriation of $100,000,000. If we vote for only $85,000,000, we shall go down in history as the 85-percent patriots.

I shall be very brief in dealing with the reduced appropriation of the National Labor Relations Board, reported by the Appropriations Committee on the ground, as set forth at page 35 of its report, that new cases docketed are decreasing and the firm belief of the committee that the Board is overstaffed. In addition, the committee recommends the entire elimination of the Division of Economic Research.

As to the reduction of the Board's case load, while it is true that representation cases are on a current basis, complaint cases are not and are steadily falling behind. This is shown at pages 556–7 of the subcommittee hearings. In view of this fact and until the committee substantiates its firm belief that the Board is overstaffed by tangible proof, the reduction from the Budget estimate should not be approved.

Although the subcommittee hearings show that the importance and necessity of the Division of Economic Research were fully stressed, the Appropriations Committee recommends its abolition. This cannot be economy, since, according to page 579 of the hearings, $45,600 is the amount paid to 15 economists who used the services of 14 other people who received a total compensation of $23,700. If the economists necessary to establish the jurisdiction of the Board are to be fired, why in the name of economy and common sense should their clerical help be retained?

I believe that this reduction is merely an indirect way of amending the Wagner Act out of existence, and on that ground I oppose it. Without the work of this section of the Board, it could not establish the existence of interstate commerce in each case. If that fact were not proven, the Board would not have jurisdiction, and it is a fact which must be established to the absolute satisfaction of the courts.

The National Labor Relations Board should be allowed the full amount of the Budget estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] for 3½ minutes.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I am very much astonished to hear the gentleman from Missouri say that he has heard no objection to this act and its administration.

At the outset let me confess that I am opposed to it. I was opposed to it when it was originally brought before the House, and I moved to recommit it. The act passed not because of the will of Congress but because it came from the White House. It was passed because it was forced on this House from the White House. It was defeated the first time it was presented. This is one of the places where the White House won its victory.

One real result of this act is that small businesses are being destroyed. Another aim of its friends is to comprehend all labor obliterating State lines. Under the interstate-commerce phase it is obliterating State lines, and the act as conceived and passed was intended to comprehend all labor within its scope. If those administering the act dealt with the problem of subnormal conditions in really interstate business, if they stayed within the original purposes of the act, they would not need as much money as they had for the current fiscal year; but they are trying to run the world, they are trying to run everybody's business. They are concerned now about subnormal bank clerks. Is it not ridiculous? The sweatshops have been forgotten. Labor accepted this act as a device to raise all labor. That is the impetus behind it, and at a time when agriculture was way below parity.

I never was more satisfied with any fight ever made than the one I made against the passage of this act. It stands next to the Labor Relations Act in the hamstringing of business in America. If I had my way I would wipe it out and let business have a chance again. I would at least limit it to the correction of subnormal conditions such as it was intended to correct.

This law may not be held constitutional when it reaches the Supreme Court, because it is a substitute for the N. R. A.; it is a stepchild of the N. R. A., forced on us against our better judgment.

In closing let me say that I resent the appointment of Army officers as administrators of these acts. The Army officer knows but one thing, loyalty to his Commander in Chief. The President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of every Army officer in particular, and he obeys the chief, the man who made this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] for 3½ minutes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, the committee should be judged by its own language. We find set out on page 13 of the committee's report the underlying reason why this cut was made against this particular agency. I think this language most significant. It tells the whole story, it tells the tale of substituting for orderly procedure in the House a new doctrine, that of dictatorship by appropriation. The language on page 13 reads as follows:

WAGE AND HOUR DIVISION

The committee recognize the necessity for some expansion in the work of the Wage and Hour Division as it develops its organization and proceeds with its program of properly policing the industries that fall within the terms of the act. They do feel, however, that until Congress shall adopt legislation amendatory of the Fair Labor Standards Act which will serve to clarify certain ambiguities in the existing law, and until those charged with the administration of the act have been able to bring about simplification of procedure, and clarification in the interpretation of the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to any such amendatory legislation, it would be improvident on the part of Congress to approve a greatly enlarged administrative set-up that could only serve in lending further difficulties to an already confused administrative problem.

In other words, in one sentence the committee says, "Yes; this money is necessary; it is necessary to keep up with the expansion of the operations of this law"; but in the next sentence it says, "Until you amend this law, until you virtually tear it to pieces, then, and then only, will we give any thought to appropriating adequate funds."

What does this constitute? It constitutes a dictatorship on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, a dictate to the effect that unless we change this law, unless we bow to the will of a few in this House who want to destroy the law, this agency will not receive the funds which are necessary for a proper administration of the act. This is an indirect method of destroying this law by crippling its administration. This procedure lends aid and comfort to every chiseling and labor-exploiting employer in the country. True friends of the wage and hour law have only one alternative, and that is to vote for the Casey amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. JENKS].

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, on an important question such as this is 3½ minutes seems a very limited time to make any sort of an argument.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know how many Members of this House have ever worked in industry and received a pay envelope on Saturday night; I do not know how many Members of this House have ever been at the head of industry and therefore know what it is to meet competition and their pay roll every Saturday night; but any of those who are here must realize that this wage-hour law that we put on the statute books is one of the greatest things for not only the employee but the employer. [Applause.]

I am mighty glad to have the remembrance that I did my small part in passing this wage-hour law. I was a member of the Labor Committee of the Seventy-fifth Congress that reported this bill. I shall remember and I shall always feel pleased and gratified that I did my part toward helping labor.

The law may not be administered 100 percent in all respects, but no law can be immediately effective in all particulars. However, if we pass a law in this Congress, why should we not appropriate sufficient funds to put that law into effect and to adequately carry it out? [Applause.] When we fail to do that, we fail to do our whole duty. I have had something to do with industry, and I know what competition is when I say to you that we should appropriate this money to clean out these rats who are infecting industry, who are sucking the lifeblood from the innocent women and children who are being subjected to low wages in this country.

I clipped an article from my home paper last night which states that 6,000 New Hampshire workers in the shoe industry out of 20,000 members of the shoe industry have been benefited by recent decisions of the Wage-Hour Board.

Mr. Chairman, as we all know, from the viewpoint of the employee, the general purpose of this act was to abolish sweatshop conditions in interstate industries, to build a floor below which wages could not sink—the minimum is now 30 cents an hour—and a ceiling above which hours should not rise, the maximum now being 42 hours a week. Through the enforcement of these provisions, the standard of living of millions of workers is gradually being raised to the level to which every human being is entitled.

From the viewpoint of the employer, the general purpose of this act was to free him from the unfair competition of the "chiseler," who, through sweatshop methods and unfair tactics, would and could undersell the industrialist who took pride in his organization and community, and wanted to do the right thing by his employees.

The enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act will gradually correct a great evil in our economic life. The passage of such an act was long overdue, but now that we have it on our statute books, let us do our best toward its equitable and efficient enforcement, thus equally benefiting employee and employer.

I do not contend that the administration of the Fair Labor Standards Act has been perfect, but I do contend that we are on our way toward improving conditions. No longer can child labor be exploited nor can men and women be reduced to a wage level that does not afford them at least the necessities of life.

I shall always feel a great satisfaction in the knowledge that during my tenure as a Member of Congress I contributed something toward bringing into being this Fair Labor Standards Act.

I hope that the Members on my side of the House will realize that the adoption of this amendment is vital to the success of the enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

[From the Manchester (N. H.) Leader of March 25, 1940]

SIX THOUSAND IN NEW HAMPSHIRE WILL RECEIVE WAGE BOOST—DAVIE DISCLOSES SHOE INDUSTRY EMPLOYS 20,000—THIRTY-FIVE-CENT RATE HELPS THOSE ON LOW-PRICED PRODUCTS

CONCORD, March 25.—Between 6,000 and 7,000 of New Hampshire's 20,000 shoe workers will be benefited by the new 35-cent minimum wage for the industry, labor authorities estimated today.

The 35-cent-per-hour minimum wage was recently approved by the Federal Wage and Hour Division on recommendation of a national wage board for the boot and shoe industry, which was appointed on March 17, 1939, and submitted its findings several months ago.

TWENTY THOUSAND TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FOUR EMPLOYED IN ALL

Statistics on file in the office of State Labor Commissioner John S. B. Davie show that the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, there were 68 shoe plants in New Hampshire, furnishing employment to 20,234 persons, of whom 10,525 were men and 9,706 were women.

Of this number, 7,081—3,431 men and 3,650 women—were employed by 24 shops, making low-priced shoes, and this is the group which will benefit chiefly from the new hourly minimum rate, it is believed.

Commissioner Davie said that there had been virtually 100 percent compliance on the part of New Hampshire shoe establishments with the provision of the Federal wage and hour law. The law required payment of a 25-cent minimum hourly wage during the first year of its operation, for a 44-hour maximum workweek, rising to 30 cents for a 42-hour week last October 24.

HOURS DROP NEXT OCTOBER

Next October the ceiling on hours will drop to 40, but the minimum wage will remain unchanged for 5 more years, when, unless the law is changed, it will rise to 40 cents. Payment of time and one-half for overtime will continue to be required in the shoe industry, as in other industries, of course.

New Hampshire had two representatives on the committee for the shoe industry which recommended the 35-cent minimum wage. They were James F. Molloy, president of the Farmington Shoe Co., of Dover, who resigned because of ill health last June, and Homer O. Rondeau, treasurer of the Rondeau Shoe Co., of Farmington.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON].

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I think it very evident from the remarks made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] that he would if he could absolutely make ineffective the wage and hour law by a denial of adequate appropriations that seems to be the issue here. I come with no criticism of the Appropriations Committee. I am willing to admit that perhaps the law needs amending but I doubt if a single Member would vote for its repeal. We have our regular legislative process for amending and perfecting laws. But what I am interested in is to see to it that we at least retain the status quo and give this law a fair opportunity to work. I think since Colonel Fleming took charge they are doing a swell job, and they have only started.

This law is founded upon justice and right. It is not yet perfect. It was intended to stop child labor, to close sweatshops, and to see to it that laboring people have fair wages and decent hours. I concur in the remarks made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] when he said that so far as he knew there is very little, if any, criticism of the administration of the act. They are entitled to a chance and cannot succeed without adequate appropriation.

The gentleman from Kansas complains that an Army man is now the Administrator. If I remember correctly, he and others were claiming that some politician was at the head of this agency when it was first established. All I have to say about Colonel Fleming is if you will look up his record, whether in Army life or serving his Government in an administrative capacity you will find that he has been a fair, just, and successful administrator in everything he has ever touched. He was drafted for this job. He is not in politics. If given proper support he will make an outstanding record in his present position.

Mr. Chairman, if the Members will look at page 3467 of the RECORD of yesterday they will find that a very sincere friend of labor, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] placed in the RECORD a brief report made to him by the administration. I do not have time to read it in detail, but among other things it says:

(1) It would prevent the expansion of the Division in accordance with the 1940 Budget. The expenditure of 1940 funds was planned on a monthly increment basis. If the Division expanded according to plan, the total personnel on the pay roll on June 30 could not be carried during the 1941 fiscal year on the reduced amount proposed by the committee.

(2) It would require the discharge of employees now working for the Division. The recruitment of inspectors has been retarded by the necessity of setting up civil-service lists. Other branches of the Division have been able to expand to their June 1940 personnel already. It will therefore be necessary to discharge employees in these branches of the Division in order to have an inspection staff proportionate to the rest of the Division.

(3) The Appropriations Committee slash equals roughly 460 inspection personnel and 30 legal personnel.

If we are to believe this statement, then more money is needed. It is interesting to note that 93 percent of industry is complying with the law without protest. The balance should be made to do so. If the law needs amending or the regulations changed, let us meet the issue squarely. I hope the amendment is adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, the question of determination of the area of production or any other question having to do with specific provisions of the Wage and Hour Act is not at stake here today. The only question before us is the question of an adequate appropriation for proper enforcement of this law. It seems to me as yet the argument made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY] has not been answered in one single respect. Now let us see exactly what the present situation is.

It is obviously impossible, when a new law is passed, for the enforcement machinery to swing into full operation overnight. It is necessary to begin on a comparatively small scale and build up your force for the purpose of the enforcement of the law over a period of time. Clearly, these expenditures in the early months of enforcement will be less than it will when the work gets fully under way. That is the way the Wage and Hour Administration has been doing. The rate of expenditure for the last month of the fiscal year 1940, as stated by Colonel Fleming in the hearings on page 341, has been expected to be at the rate of an annual expenditure for all items of $7,716,000. The Budget figure submitted and which this amendment seeks to restore is some $230,000 below that figure. That is the estimated rate of expenditure for the last month of the current fiscal year. What has happened here is that the committee has cut below that rate of expenditure so that the enforcement machinery planned for over a period of time to bring into operation an effective enforcement machinery will necessarily be crippled in the year that lies ahead. The whole plan has been to build the enforcement around a corps of inspectors and to pattern the rest of the personnel around that force. The corps of inspectors that has been planned for from the beginning of this administration will have to be cut unless the Casey amendment is adopted.

On page 341 of the hearings Colonel Fleming makes a most significant statement. He says:

We feel we have a very serious enforcement problem ahead of us and, unless we enforce promptly and thoroughly, we probably will have an increasing load of work, whereas if we do enforce thoroughly, I think we will have a rather decreasing problem afterward.

The point is a matter of justice as between the employer who is in voluntary compliance with the act, on the one hand, and the one who is not, on the other hand. Most of the employees of the Nation are no doubt complying with this law with absolute faithfulness. In justice to those employers it is essential that an adequate amount of money be provided for the enforcement of this act, so that other people can be brought into proper compliance.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe the gentleman wants to be correct.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I certainly do.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman mentioned the figure "1940" in connection with the proposed expenditure of $7,716,000. The gentleman meant that as of the beginning of the fiscal year 1941?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is right. I was referring to the rate of expenditure at the close of the fiscal year 1940 and the beginning of the fiscal year 1941. As I read the hearings, the figure for 1941 is based on the rate of expenditure in the closing month of 1940.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman believe that if he had the $7,716,000 that would be adequate?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I am not in a position to judge, obviously, but I believe the head of the Wage-Hour Administration is in a position to judge and, furthermore, that is the Budget figure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the wage and hour bill for the reason that I believed the purpose and the intent of the bill was in the interest of the wage earner of the country and that if properly administered in line with the purpose and the intent of the act, it would not operate against industry. We have had considerable trouble in connection with the administration of the wage and hour law, but it is my firm belief that the trouble was with Mr. Andrews and those who had charge of administering the act. The trouble in connection with the administration of this legislation is largely in line with the administration of many constructive pieces of legislation passed by the Congress. That is, under rules and regulations written by the Administrator, many of which are not in line with the real purpose and intent of the bill, therefore, as stated, in my judgment, the trouble has not been with the Wage and Hour Act, but as administered under the rules and regulations written by the Administrator. I believe Colonel Fleming is deeply interested in working out and rewriting the rules and regulations governing the administration of the Wage and Hour Act so that he will be able to more nearly carry out the real purpose and intent of the legislation. This being true, naturally, Colonel Fleming and his assistants will have to be in a position to employ proper personnel, including many investigators, so as to be able to send them into the various sections of the country for the purpose of securing information and real facts in the interest of properly administering the act.

Therefore, the pending amendment, as far as I am concerned, is a good, common-sense, businesslike amendment, and I shall be very glad to support this amendment. One of the major complaints in my country has been against the manner in which the act had been administered in that the administration has not been based on a practical, common-sense basis.

For instance, in my district there can be several cotton mills in one county. Some of these cotton mills have continued to operate with old machinery which necessitated the employing of a large number of employees. Other mills, perhaps in the same community, have been operating with improved machinery, which naturally have cut their employment considerably.

I visited one of these mills and had the privilege of looking over one piece of machinery that was taking the place of 25 employees. The mill that did not install that type of machinery, as stated, continued to employ these 25 persons. This is true in many other industries. For instance, some time ago I visited two or three large sawmill plants in Alabama. They own thousands of acres of timberland where they are largely carrying on proper forestry practices. In other words, they are using a considerable amount of Federal fire-protection money and their timber resources are growing into wealth. These large sawmill operators have installed improved and up-to-date machinery. From their logging operations on up to and through their sawmills and even in loading the lumber on trucks, it is done by machinery.

Therefore, they do not employ the number of people that those mills do that continue operating with wage earners instead of improved machinery. Many of the small sawmill operators and other small industries are being forced out of business because they are unable to pay the wages that the large operators, who have installed improved machinery, as stated. I believe that the wage earners in the small plant should receive a fair wage; but certainly if you are going to place them on the same basis with the operator of a large sawmill plant, or the operator of any other type of large industry, then you simply force the small operators and small industries out of business, which brings about increased unemployment and tends to assist the large operators in bringing about a hogtied monopoly.

Let me refer to one problem we have in the Southeast, and I particularly call this to the attention of the Members from the Southeast. During recent years we have had some forty-odd pulp and paper mills locating in the South. Not only are these people paying very small wages to a great many of their own employees, but in that they have a hogtied monopoly in buying pulpwood from farmers; farmers are not getting anything like the cost of production for their pulpwood, and thousands of employees engaged in cutting and hauling pulpwood are not getting enough to support their families. They are not only robbing the farmers of one of the greatest resources we have in that area, but they are bleeding the wage earner white. We have wonderful resources in the South, and if we had proper prices for our raw material and fair wages for thousands of wage earners, all of which would mean proper income, it is my firm belief that the years would not be many before we would have the greatest section in the South to be found anywhere in the United States.

This amendment, I understand, will increase the amount carried in the bill to the figures suggested by the Budget Director. I have every confidence in Colonel Fleming and his ability and his good intentions in rewriting many of the rules and regulations so as to secure a proper administration of the act which we should have in behalf of the innocent wage earners of the country. The wage and hour law should be amended in several instances, and I think it is very unfair on the part of those who are doing everything possible to keep down the consideration of proper amendments for the reason that unless this act is properly amended and properly administered, it will prove to be a failure, and if so it will prove to be the biggest blow and set-back to labor we have had in many years. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, those who are in favor of the Wage and Hour Act and want to see it adequately administered in the interest of all the people should vote for this amendment. This law has been honestly, conscientiously, and ably administered by both Mr. Andrews and Colonel Fleming. The act has been very difficult to administer. You must remember that the law has undergone changes each year. The start was made with the 25-cent minimum, and in the year 1939 it was stepped up to a 30-cent minimum. The hours began at 44 hours a week, and the next year they were reduced to 42 hours. In October they will be reduced to 40 hours a week. Therefore, in order to administer the act properly, they must go over the field again. In order really to weed out the chiselers they must have the proper personnel. Think of it; 815 employees is the personnel of the Wage and Hour Division.

In my State there are nearly 900 in the personnel of the Social Security. The reason the law has not been administered as some think it should be is because of a lack of personnel. There is no confusion, as held by the Appropriations Committee, in the administration of this act, but if there was it would not be because agricultural labor is not clearly defined in the act. This confusion has been brought about by the processors, the packers, and those who want to make legal home work, this disgraceful and damnable home work we have been fighting to abolish for 50 years. They want to legalize home work. They want to exempt from the act every employee that in any manner touches any farm products, Swift and Armour and Dole, the large packing companies. They all want to be exempted. They want to exempt 2,000,000 industrial workers and call them agricultural workers. Mr. Andrews tried to institute the area of production, and that is why he got into most of his trouble. He tried to define the area, and within that area the canners and packers and processors were under the act, but those over the line were not under the act, and he immediately caused chaos and received condemnation everywhere from the men who were inside the area.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS F. FORD].

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me just a half minute?

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. I cannot yield now if it is to be taken out of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Casey amendment for three reasons. The first is because I am convinced that the Wage and Hour Division needs the money to effectively enforce the law, and if the amendment is not adopted the Wage and Hour Division is going to be hogtied and hamstrung and prevented from carrying out the most important provisions of the law; and, second, because if the law is not fully enforced, many of the honest, fair-minded employers will be injured because of the existence of and the encouragement of that most reprehensible of human bloodsuckers, the chiseler; and, third, because it has for its purpose the raising of the standard of living among workers in these industries that have heretofore refused to or by reason of the existence of the chiseler, been forced to refuse to, pay a decent wage.

The increased pay due to this act has increased purchasing power, this increased purchasing power increases business and makes for a better type of employee, and in increasing business it increases employment and in increasing employment it gives a stream of new lifeblood to the entire economic system of the United States. Labor needs this act in the interest of justice, industry needs it in the interest of fair dealing among competitive industries. For these reasons I urge that the Casey amendment be adopted.

I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to reply to a statement made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD] when he spoke of 896 employees as being the personnel. Did I understand the gentleman from Missouri correctly on that?

Mr. WOOD. I just got that information from Colonel Fleming this morning.

Mr. HOUSTON. The personnel of Wage and Hour?

Mr. WOOD. That is it.

Mr. HOUSTON. They are just the field employees. Altogether in administrative employees they are authorized to have at this time 1,446 and if the bill, as reported by the committee, goes through they will have 744 more.

Mr. WOOD. The information Colonel Fleming gave was that they have 815 men now and if this appropriation carries they will have 2,000, and that is what they need.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, 2 years ago I was a supporter of this legislation. When I went back home and told the chamber of commerce what I had done they were very much disappointed in their Congressman. However, I told them I thought I was right. We talked it over and they said, "Yes; but you are doing all of this from a humanitarian standpoint. You are all for the worker, and here we are composed of manufacturers, and where do we come in on this picture?" "Ah," I said, "that is the question I wished you would ask me. You are going to find that nobody in this country is going to use California products if they can get some State's products cheaper, and when I vote for wage and hour legislation that equalizes these dollars and cents and hours, you are going to find that they will use your products, not to the detriment of any other State's products but on exactly the same basis, and as good businessmen I think you will like that."

I did not hear any more on this question until about 3 weeks ago. Imagine my surprise to receive a complaint from the chamber of commerce and some of the canners in my district. They complained that under the California law they had to pay the women workers 33⅓ cents an hour, which is correct, and they were competing against certain sections of this country where employers were paying that same type of labor 7 cents an hour. All were engaged in interstate commerce and therefore my people felt that the Wage and Hour Division should do something about it. I thought so, too, and so I took it up with the Division and I found that they did not have enough of a field force to go into these competitive districts and actually enforce the Wage and Hour Act that we had placed on the statute books. Now, there is a case that comes right straight home to me.

You can well imagine how I feel on this question. I shall vote for the Casey amendment, and I shall vote for enforcement of this law right down into every section of this country; and if they want to make the rate of pay 50 cents an hour, all the better with me. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, just a word to my delightful friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY]. He says if you vote against this increase you are unfriendly to the act itself. Mr. Chairman, I was one of the original few who favored the act. I even signed the petition, a most unusual proceeding for me, and the gentleman will recall it. However, I must support the committee. As the ranking man on the Committee on Expenditures, I must try to stop these raids on the Treasury. I favor this law, but I do not wish a large police force that will be greatly increased yearly, as in every other bureau, and later impossible to pry from the pay roll. I desire to proceed carefully with this law. There are many groups that we did not mean to include in it, and who are now suffering hardships as a result and should obtain immediate relief. Again I want to be reasonable. Among other items in this bill, I might like to vote to increase the appropriation for the N. Y. A., but if I refuse to increase the appropriation, that does not signify that I am opposed to the project. I believe in the wage-hour law, and I want it to remain on the statute books. I want it enforced reasonably and not in a way that will harass business too much. I have naturally been hesitant to vote for measures that would harass business. I felt that this law was necessary. I am now speaking from the standpoint of the Expenditures Committee. I am greatly worried about this attempt to increase the liberal appropriations that the committee has made. I am worried about the recent huge appropriations made for agriculture. I have given a little bit of advice. I share it with you. If you want to get greatly increased appropriations "make a noise like a farmer."

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman. I intend to support the Casey amendment. If the amendment presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts is not adopted, it means that several hundred persons will lose their jobs. Congress has been quite successful this year in cutting appropriations and when appropriations are cut it means that men and women are forced out of employment and are compelled to go into the bread lines. The honest businessman is not opposed to this act but the unscrupulous businessman is. The unscrupulous businessman knows it would be a difficult task to have this law repealed so he resorts to underhanded methods by having his friends in Congress cut the appropriations and that is what has been taking place. As I said on the floor yesterday, and I say it again today, there are at least ten or twelve million people out of work and do not think for a moment they are going to be satisfied with these conditions, and we Members of Congress are responsible for the troubled conditions existing in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, the case of the businessman has been very well explained by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. JENKS]. I want to say a word or so from the standpoint of labor. I have in my hand several telegrams that I have received from labor organizations out in my area, and I shall read some of them to you:

United Furniture Workers of America, Local 756, demands that slash bill for N. L. R. B. and Wage-Hour Administration not be effected. Imperative that you exert all efforts toward this end.

Labor Non-Partisan League of Los Angeles County urges you vote against slashing appropriations for administration of National Labor Relations Act and Wage and Hour Act. These poorly disguised efforts to starve out effective administration of these laws must be defeated by those who believe in fair play for labor.

HUGH WILKINS,
Los Angeles County Chairman of Labors.

Oil workers union, Long Beach, 4,000 members, unanimously ask you vote against reduction appropriations National Labor Relations Board and Wage and Hour Administration. You vote against all amendments National Labor Relations Act.

J. C. COULTER,
Oil Workers Union, No. 128.

Los Angeles handlers urge you represent them by voting against reduced appropriations of Wage-Hour Administration and National Labor Board.

P. W. O. C. STOCKHANDLERS, LOCAL 68, C. I. O.

Armour workers against reduced appropriations of Wage-Hour Administration and National Labor Board. Oppose this vicious antilabor legislation.

P. W. O. C., LOCAL 12, C. I. O.

The International Longshoremen's Warehousemen's Union protests slashes Labor Board and Wage-Hour Administration proposed by the House Appropriations Committee. Urge you actively oppcse and vote against vicious underhanded attack on labor legislation.

Vote against reduced appropriations of National Labor Board and Wage-Hour Administration. Swift & Co. workers need action from these agencies.

P. W. O. C., LOCAL 67, C. I. O.

Organized Pacific coast packing-house workers and livestock handlers need more Wage Hour Act enforcement and Labor Board action. Fight reduced appropriations for these agencies.

DISTRICT 5, P. W. O. C.

One hundred thousand California C. I. O. members protest slashes Labor Board and Wage-Hour appropriations proposed by House Appropriations Committee. Urge you actively oppose and vote against vicious, underhanded attack on labor legislation. Please advise us your action.

CALIFORNIA STATE INDUSTRIAL UNION COUNCIL.

Reduced appropriations to National Labor Board and Wage-Hour Administration deprives Los Angeles Cudahy workers of their rights. Oppose these reductions.

P. W. O. C., LOCAL 107, C. I. O.

In view of tremendous responsibility resting upon shoulders of our democracy to take care of its youth in these times of mass unemployment and poverty, this organization urges you vote against cutting down original appropriations of $100,000,000 for National Youth Administration.

HUGH WILKINS,
Los Angeles County Chairman, Labor Nonpartisan League.

I have another group of these telegrams on my desk, which I did not bring, but I say that labor as well as industry will benefit by a real administration of this act. It might be of interest to know that among those who are fighting most viciously against this measure are to be found some people from a certain section of the country, where democracy is unknown, the poll-tax States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I first want to put my unqualified mark of approval upon the short but very effective speech of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER], especially for this reason: The gentleman comes from that part of the South that makes his word largely a matter of law to me, because it is the result of experience and clearly indicates what possibilities are involved there.

I also want to endorse what the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. JENKS] said a few moments ago, because he also speaks from the facts in actual business. Then I want to point out to this Committee as best I can the perfectly evident fact to any student of this subject that a law that really benefits labor also in the long run benefits the investor in legitimate industry. You cannot separate the two. Our difficulty is a matter of lack of getting together, a failure to understand, because that part of this country that is in most continuous prosperity is the place where wages are high and where those wages are acceptable to the men who are paying them just as well as they are to the men who are receiving them. If we are going to solve the problem we are up against at the present time, we ought to understand that much about it at least.

Now, actually what we are driving at is to do exactly what the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Fulmer, says is necessary in South Carolina, and I add in every other State where wages are below what they ought to be as well. That is, we must come, as soon as possible, to the 40-hour week and the 40 cents per hour wage as a basis. When we get to that, as we are going to, we will be where we can make a new start along economic lines in this country. Until we do, we are going to find ourselves doing futile things that we ought not be doing. We have to understand that this is one country economically as well as politically. We have to learn that in those sections where wages are low, they will be more benefited by a raise in wages than any other part of this country—the employer, the merchant, the professional man, all alike. We have to understand that in those places where the wages are highest, it is only through the raising of the wages in the low-wage sections to a certain general level that we can get what we are driving at, a national standard of wages and living conditions, and thereby make prosperity permanent throughout our whole country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the argument in this case, which involves an appropriation, should justify the assertion that the Appropriations Committee is seeking to emasculate and destroy the wage and hour law. Nor do I think that the argument, typified by that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY], that every person who contemplates voting against this amendment is necessarily voting to crucify the wage and hour law, is justified. That type of argument is of the character that has been used by prosecuting attorneys for years, who stand before a jury when a man is charged with a crime and say to the jury, "Unless you vote to convict this man you are voting against law and order generally, and in order to sustain law and order you must vote to convict this man."

The fact of the matter is your subcommittee gave intelligent study to this question, and has given to this Wage and Hour Division $1,640,000 more than it had last year.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not have time to yield.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I would like to answer the gentleman.

Mr. KEEFE. Just a moment. I refuse to yield. I call your attention, if you will read the testimony of Colonel Fleming, to the fact that he, himself, stated that they had immeasurable difficulty with this so-called area-of-production situation that is involved in this law. The general counsel, Mr. McNulty, does not know what it means. The Administrator does not know what it means. They are trying to enforce regulations, by inspections, that they do not understand, and they have so testified. They want additional inspectors to go out and enforce a law which they testified before our committee they, themselves, do not understand.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not yield. I do not have time to yield.

The argument has been made repeatedly that if this appropriation bill is passed as reported by the committee it will result in the discharge of employees. That statement has been made repeatedly. The fact of the matter is, if you will read the record, that the Department has not even appointed the number of inspectors they were provided for in the appropriation for the current fiscal year. You will also find the statement made, "Oh, we know that, but they had to put on the supporting personnel in the Department, and they built up their secretarial staff and their attorneys in contemplation of the appointment of additional inspectors." The fact is, if you will turn to page 342 of the hearings and read the testimony of Colonel Fleming—and that is what I am going by—that that is not the fact. He says it is not the fact; that the supporting personnel is not put on in the Department until the inspectors are first appointed.

Now, will somebody be kind enough to tell me how there will be any discharge of employees when we have given them $1,600,000 increase in their appropriation, and when they could still appoint some 50 inspectors more than they have now, on their present appropriation?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I would like to answer the gentleman if he will yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not a fact that, in the event this bill passes the House the way the committee brought it in, they still will be authorized to appoint 744 additional employees?

Mr. KEEFE. Exactly. The impression has been given out that, instead of giving this Department an increase in line with what it needs to gradually carry on the enforcement activities of the Wage and Hour Division, that the Appropriations Committee is going to cut the personnel. The fact is, we are giving them over 700 new personnel if this appropriation carries as your committee reported it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK].

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I feel that we should give the Wage and Hour Administration sufficient funds to carry out the act. I do not believe we should do anything to limit their activities which are so necessary if they are to carry out what Congress intended them to do. For that reason, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I am in favor of and will support the Casey amendment. [Applause.]

In the Appropriations Committee meeting I opposed the cutting out of the appropriation of $3,000,000 for administrative increases for Federal employees. I appreciate the good work done by the subcommittee on this bill and their sincerity in making their recommendations. However, I believe the House should accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY] which will restore the Budget recommendation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be permitted to proceed without any of my colleagues who have spoken in favor of this amendment feeling that I am unduly critical. Most of the arguments I have heard advanced in favor of this amendment if valid would be equally valid in favor of an appropriation of $10,000,000, $15,000,000, or any other sum which might be suggested.

The thing I believe we ought to consider is: What sum is reasonably necessary for the Wage and Hour Administration to carry out its functions in an orderly way? I feel sure that no Member of the House desires to make provision for their use of funds in excess of such amount as may be reasonably necessary, especially under existing financial conditions of the Government.

Lest we forget, may I again make reference to the fact that in the number of field inspectors they have as of February 1, 1940, they are still 64 below the number authorized for the present fiscal year. This information will be found on pages 345 and 346 of volume I of the hearings. If you will turn to page 360 of the hearings you will find that in the field force they have 868 people at the present time. They intend to recruit 757 more during the present year, and they propose to add 411 for the fiscal year 1941, making a total in excess of 2,000 that they propose to have next year in the field force as against 868 at the time the hearings were conducted, or an increase of approximately two and one-half times the number of the present field force.

The appropriation we have recommended here, which envisions an increase of $1,644,000 for their use for the next fiscal year, will provide them with nearly twice the field personnel they have now. May I advert to an item we discussed yesterday?

The travel item is connected with this item. The House decided not to allow the increase of $140,000 for this purpose additional to that proposed in the Budget estimate. I said to the House then that if you intended when we reached the salaries item to increase that you ought to increase the travel item, otherwise you would have an increase in salaries with no travel money to enable the additional field personnel to function.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. So I think that, unless the House has changed its mind on that subject, we certainly should not adopt the pending amendment, because it is inseparably connected with the other item which the House rejected on yesterday.

I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. On yesterday, when the gentleman made a similar remark, I tried to say that the amendment I offered yesterday was the first of a series of three that dealt with the Wage-Hour Division.

Mr. TARVER. The gentlewoman is entirely correct. If the personnel is to be increased, then, of course, the travel item also ought to be increased, as was proposed in the gentlewoman's amendment.

If you grant the increase of personnel which is here requested, in view of the action which you took yesterday upon the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey, you would have additional personnel but no money on which they could travel to enable them to function.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Is there any reason why if this amendment is passed the small item proposed yesterday could not be inserted in the Senate?

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman will understand, of course, that I am not interested in the action of the Senate; I am simply endeavoring to be consistent in the position which I take with regard to this bill. I am sure the membership of the House desire to be consistent in the votes they may cast on the pending amendment. I do not believe that the Wage-Hour Administration, in its operations for the next fiscal year, will in any way be hampered by the action which has been recommended to the House by the subcommittee. I want to say to you frankly that if I did feel it would be so hampered I would not have participated in the action.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 90, noes 98.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts, Mr. VOORHIS of California, and Mr. WOOD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. HOUSTON and Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 115, noes 148.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous expenses (other than salaries): For all authorized and necessary expenses, other than salaries, of the Wage and Hour Division in performing the duties imposed upon it by the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, including contract stenographic reporting services, purchase (not to exceed $2,250), maintenance, repair, and operation outside the District of Columbia of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, law books, books of reference, periodicals, manuscripts and special reports, newspapers and press clippings, supplies, office equipment, advertising, postage, telephone and telegraph service, reimbursement to State, Federal, and local agencies and their employees for services rendered, $275,000.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to explain the situation as it now exists. I have several amendments pending on the desk, but I am not going to speak on them. I am going to allow them to be presented pro forma because I consider the last amendment the most important amendment, the one on which we joined issue. I am happy to have this opportunity to thank the Republicans as well as the Democrats who joined in swelling our total to 115 to restore the Budget and the President's estimate of what is necessary in order to efficiently administer the Wage and Hour Division.

Mr. Chairman, I want to talk to some of my Republican friends, because I cannot get anywhere talking to those on the Democratic side who voted against my amendment. They voted against it because they are opposed to the principle of wages and hours. I am happy to speak to those on the Republican side who are in favor of this principle. In the original wage-hour fight we had some Republican support. As a matter of fact, we could not have passed this act had we not had Republican support. I want to speak to those Republicans who favor wage and hour legislation and ask, Why did you oppose the Budget estimate? Did you take consolation and comfort in the fact that this is a higher estimate than last year? If so, let me disabuse your minds. The chairman of the subcommittee who instigated this cut in the Budget is unfriendly to wage-hour legislation. I do not believe he voted for the wage-hour legislation originally.

The Appropriations Committee virtually promised Colonel Fleming last July that it would go through with his estimate made then. On page 341 of the hearings the first thing he said to this subcommittee was:

> I think I should say first of all while this is an apparent increase over last year, it is really not an actual one.
> When the Wage and Hour Division appeared before the subcommittee last July to ask for additional sums in the deficiency bill, the statement was made, and apparently was understood, as appears in the record, from both sides, that the rate of expenditure at the beginning of the fiscal year 1941 by reason of appropriations then made, would be annually $7,716,000.

My amendment was in accord with that rate of expenditure. In other words, while not signed, sealed, and delivered, it was understood by the deficiency subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee that it would go along on these figures.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. May I say to the gentleman that I voted with him to raise this amount to the Budget estimate. However, I do not believe it is fair to the other members of the Democratic Party who voted the other way that they should be criticized for having done so, in view of all the legislation the Democratic Party has put on the statute books for labor.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman, may I say that I would rather not have the wage-hour law on the books at all than to have one which cannot be enforced. I would not have it there if it cannot be properly enforced. I believe Colonel Fleming is in agreement with that statement. If we do not appropriate the necessary money to properly enforce that law, it will fall of its own weight, and it will become unpopular. You cannot say to the manufacturer in Massachusetts that we have not enough money to enforce the law in other sections and make him live up to the provisions of the act. The manufacturers in my district, the manufacturers of New England, never needed a Wage and Hour Act. They were paying over and above the minimum. They were paying time and a half for overtime. If we do not have a force sufficient to crack down on the manufacturers who are not obeying this law, we are being unfair to the employers who do obey it; and I say to the Members who say it is unnecessary to have the amount set forth in my amendment that I will stake the opinion of Colonel Fleming, the Budget Bureau, and the President against the chairman of the subcommittee, who is not in favor of the sentiment expressed by the wage-hour law. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

> This title may be cited as the Department of Labor Appropriation Act, 1941.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have offered this motion for the sole purpose of making a further explanation of my position in respect to this matter, which my colleague refused to let me do a few minutes ago by not further yielding. I am not one of those who believe in enacting legislation and making it law, then crippling it by withdrawal of sufficient appropriations. I voted for the raising of the amount back to the Budget estimate, for enforcement of the wage and hour law, not only on that principle but because I feel when we have a statute on the books we ought to see to it that it is enforced. I regret that my splendid colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY] has seen fit to criticize our Democratic colleagues who voted against the amendment offered by the gentleman.

I differ from my colleague from Massachusetts in this respect: If there is any party under the sun that is entitled to full credit for dragging labor out of a hole in America, and freeing it of economic slavery, it is the Democratic Party and the present administration. When men have views based on conscientious objections in opposition to some proposal here and they happen to be Democrats, I do not think they ought to be singled out and lambasted and criticized by one of our colleagues. I think the House Committee on Appropriations has done what its members thought was right, and ordinarily they ought to be upheld. I believe in economy, but I do not believe in economy at the expense of the workers of this country.

I regret the amendment was not agreed to and I do not think it is a proper or fair way of controlling the methods of enforcement of the law, to withdraw appropriations which can only have one effect and that is to weaken rather than strengthen enforcement. Strict and adequate enforcement is imperative if honest labor is to be protected against the enemies of the wage and hour law and that cannot and will not be accomplished by reducing this appropriation. I have stated that the present Democratic administration has been the real friend of labor and, what are the facts to support our claim? Early in the New Deal administration we Democrats, in full control of both branches of the Congress, enacted what is known as the National Industrial Recovery Act that broke the shackles of slavery from the limbs of the toilers of this land and guaranteed the right to collective bargaining. Having that right, labor marched forward and set up the finest and best system of organized effort known to all our history in behalf of labor. As a result of collective-bargaining agreements wages have been raised from a rate that was a disgrace to any nation, to a living wage, and, as a direct result, economic recovery was made possible and our country was saved from economic chaos. That was followed by the enactment of the wage and hour law that fixed a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours of labor. It is the difference between economic liberty on the one hand and servitude without adequate compensation on the other. That was followed by enactment of the Labor Relations Act, to insure enforcement and protection of the rights of organized labor. That has been supplemented by the enactment of laws to provide for social security in the form of old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, maternal and child welfare, public health, and numerous other things I have not time now to mention. The people know too well the merits of the achievements of our party.

My position is that I shall never, under any circumstances, rise on the floor of this House and question the right of any man to vote as he pleases on any matter that comes before the House for consideration. To that extent I wholly disagree with my splendid colleague from Massachusetts, and

I shall vote to reinstate the appropriation for the Labor Board. [Applause.]

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY] pay tribute to the Republicans in Congress and to the Republican Party for their support of labor, and that tribute is well deserved. Frankly, in every State legislature which the Republican Party has dominated, the Republicans have for many years sponsored, voted for, and voted for consistently, every important measure providing for labor benefits, such as minimum-wage laws for women, workmen's compensation laws, and many other similar laws which I could name.

I respect the gentleman from Kentucky, but I wish to take issue with him when he says that the Democratic Party has done so much for labor. We find labor now divided into two armed camps, and ever since this administration came into power labor has been divided.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. No; I do not yield.

Labor has never been so divided.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman has mentioned me.

Mr. BENDER. I will yield in just a moment.

To me, this is the crux of the whole matter. As I understand, $1,644,000 more has been appropriated for the conduct of this Division than was appropriated last year by the committee and by the House, according to its action today. There were 896 inspectors provided for in 1940. According to the Casey amendment, the number would be raised to 2,018. On February 1 of this year there were 334 field inspectors, although the Budget authorized the employment of 398 inspectors; in other words, we had fewer field inspectors employed by the Department than the Budget authorized. Further, we have increased the number of field inspectors in the present Budget as of February 1 from 334 to 661. In my opinion, we are increasing the number of field inspectors for better enforcement of the law.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BENDER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. The gentleman has distorted my remarks. I did not praise the Republican Party; I praised the few, the all-too-few members of the Republican Party sitting here who voted progressively on labor. However, there were not enough of them. I do not believe the Republican Party is friendly to labor, but it has a few progressive members who are. The Democratic Party by a vast majority has always shown its friendship to labor.

Mr. BENDER. I will take issue with the gentleman on that question and will be pleased to compare notes with him.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. How many Republicans voted for the wage-hour bill?

Mr. BENDER. In the Ohio Legislature the Republican Party, when in control, has consistently supported legislation for labor. I was a member of the Ohio Senate for five terms, and there was a great deal of labor legislation passed during that decade for the improvement of labor. That was long before we ever heard of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Some people in this country have the idea that everything began as of March 4, 1933. I believe, and there are many who support my contention, that the worst period for labor in the history of our country started on March 4, 1933, and labor will pay the price and will continue to pay the price in the years to come. As I say, instead of labor being united and being on one side of the fence, we now have labor almost evenly divided into two camps. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to make this statement in justice to the able chairman of this committee. I worked on this bill personally for weeks before the subcommittee went into session. We worked on this bill in committee week after week from 10 o'clock in the morning until 12:30 and from 1 o'clock until 5 o'clock, going over the bill item by item. This bill came out of the committee with every member of the subcommittee, Republican and Democrat, supporting every item in it.

I believe it is unfair for any Member, be he Republican or Democrat, to insinuate that any personal opinion the chairman of this subcommittee may or may not have had with regard to the wage and hour bill was the guiding influence in his actions on any part of the work the committee has done. Nothing was said on or off the record that I can recall by our able and distinguished chairman of the subcommittee that would display any unfairness of any kind. He gave the best that is in him to this bill and to the wage and hour part of the bill. He worked fairly, hard, and impartially on it.

Up until this moment, Mr. Chairman, the word "Republican" or "Democrat" has not been mentioned in the discussion of this bill. The votes on these amendments have not been along party lines. I regret that partisanship has been injected into this issue. I sincerely hope that from now on we can discuss whatever may come before the committee not as Republicans or Democrats but as Members of the House who are interested in the issues before us. [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, there are no amendments to this paragraph except pro forma amendments. In the interest of conservation of time I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto do now close. This will not prevent the gentlemen who wish to speak from getting time a little later, but let us move along now.

Mr. HEALEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want 5 minutes.

Mr. HEALEY. I object to the request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mr. HEALEY, there were—ayes 115, noes 23.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Division of Personnel Supervision and Management, $427,520.

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to my colleague from Ohio when he stated that it was only under Republican-controlled legislatures that labor got anything in these United States. I think it has come time to look at the record. Let us find out what labor did receive under the Republican administrations. I can best do this by citing the record in my own State, a neighboring State to the one of the gentleman from Ohio.

Before the 1938 election, the Democratic Party in Pennsylvania, through the legislature, gave to labor for the first time such important bills as the little Labor Relations Act and the anti-injunction bill. They raised the standing of the State in compensation payments from No. 20 up to about No. 2, increasing the minimum payments from about $9 to $15. They gave them much additional labor legislation.

Let us look at the record since 1938.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SACKS. I yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McGRANERY. After the Democrats gave these things to the working people of Pennsylvania, what happened after the Republicans took control of the Legislature of Pennsylvania in 1938?

Mr. SACKS. I am just coming to that. In 1938, during the campaign, the Republican Party went up and down the State promising the voters that they would continue with a liberal administration. But let us look at the record of Mr. James and let us look at the record of the Republican Party. The first thing they did when they got control of the legislature was to send back the standing of the State of Pennsylvania on compensation from No. 2 to No. 20. They reduced, Mr. Chairman, the minimum payments under workmen's compensation from $15 back to $9. That was the gods' gift of the Republican Party to the workers of Pennsylvania, but that was not enough. They repealed the Anti-Injunction Act. They went further and sabotaged the administration of the Labor Relations Board. They even went further than that and, in conjunction with their administration, sabotaged the Women's Minimum Age Act.

The Republican Party in Pennsylvania today, by its own admission is not the friend of labor and would return labor to the control of the manufacturers and the special interests, which was the situation that existed before the advent of the Democratic administration in Pennsylvania in 1934.

What else did they do? They came along and promised in our own city of Philadelphia, where they were in control, that they would take care of labor, and what did they do? They dug down into the pockets of the wage earner in the city of Philadelphia and put a tax on the salary of even the relief worker in Philadelphia.

This is their shining record for labor; and how about my friend's own State? What did Governor Bricker do when labor needed help in the State of Ohio? The record speaks for itself.

Mr. BENDER. What did he do? Will the gentleman answer that?

Mr. SACKS. I will tell the gentleman what he did. He allowed the State of Ohio to go back to where it was before the Democrats took control of that State. [Applause.]

Mr. BENDER. Is it not a fact that Governor Bricker——

Mr. SACKS. I do not yield any more. The gentleman did not yield to me.

I want to say now that if the Republican Party wants to stand on its record in the legislatures of the various States, then I say that we can go to the country and ask labor whether the Democratic Party gave them a fair deal or whether the Republicans gave them a fair deal.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SACKS. I yield.

Mr. McGRANERY. Did Governor Bricker do a little head knocking with the militia on labor?

Mr. SACKS. Certainly, and everybody knows that in the State of Ohio. [Laughter.]

I say to my friends there is only one thing to do. If my friend wants to stand on the record of 1938, we will stand on the Democratic record for the last 7 years. [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I shall proceed only for a moment or two. I very regretfully shall have to make points of order against gentlemen who do not discuss the bill. I shall not make a point of order against any gentleman who moves to strike out the last word and who talks about the subject matters included in the bill. I shall not attempt to hold him to a discussion of the last word, which could be done under the rules, but in view of the unanimous-consent agreement reached in the House that general debate would be confined to the bill itself after the first day, I think I am acting in accordance with the will of the House when I say that I shall hereafter make points of order against any gentleman who undertakes to discuss matters, under a pro forma amendment, that are not related to the bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman think it is fair when we have Members of Congress get up and condemn things that are going on in Pennsylvania—and we know what happened there during the Earle administration for 4 years—that we ought not to have a chance to get up here and tell the gentleman from Philadelphia, Pa. [Mr. SACKS], that he is absolutely wrong?

Mr. TARVER. Permit me to say to the gentleman that in view of the speech which has just been made, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other gentleman on his side of the aisle desires to address the House for 5 minutes on the same subject matter, I shall make no point of order against him, because I deem it fair that you have an opportunity to reply to what a gentleman has said; otherwise, I shall insist on the point of order.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: In view of the speech that my friend possibly would make, does not the gentleman think we should be accorded the same opportunity?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we ought to have a general field day on political matters. We have a bill here which we are considering which involves $954,000,000.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, a member of the committee.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, but I was on my feet and had asked the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER], to yield to me and he graciously did yield.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Is it not a fact that the Member from Pennsylvania [Mr. SACKS] who spoke just a moment ago, until 6 years ago was himself a member of that terrible Republican Party in Pennsylvania, which he now condemns?

Mr. RICH. Absolutely that is the fact.

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. No; I cannot yield. The gentleman had his 5 minutes. Mr. Chairman, I want to answer this gentleman from Pennsylvania. Under the Earle regime, with the terrible new dealers that we had in Pennsylvania—it almost wrecked Pennsylvania. It was a bad administration for our State.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not addressing himself to his amendment.

Mr. RICH. But I was permitted by the gentleman of Georgia to have 5 minutes out of order; he is chairman of the subcommittee and promised me that courtesy.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must confine himself to the amendment.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I hope this will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BENDER. A gentleman who previously spoke referred to Governor Bricker and to the militia. In answer to that——

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentlemen are not addressing themselves to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Michigan insists upon his point of order, the Chair will reluctantly be obliged to state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania must either confine himself to the bill or cease.

Mr. RICH. I am confining myself to the amendment, when I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, who will reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SACKS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio must also confine himself to the amendment.

Mr. BENDER. I am confining myself to a statement made previously, I understood, with permission to reply to that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. But no point of order was made previously to any such argument.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York to submit a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. RICH. I do not. I yield now to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Is it not a fact that during the administration of Governor Bricker, of Ohio, the militia has not been called out at any time? The Democrats are confused; it was Davey, the Democrat, who called out the militia, and not Bricker.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman is exactly right. Governor Bricker is a fine Governor and obeys the law and enforces it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed in order.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is a great deal of discussion here this afternoon relative to matters as to which some Members of the House would like to protect themselves from the criticism they are receiving back home because of legislation that was passed, especially back in the State of Pennsylvania, when we had the Earle administration 4 years ago in Pennsylvania whereby many bad laws were passed.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not addressing himself to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed in order or the Chair will advise him to take his seat.

Mr. RICH. But whenever I start to get to a conclusion on something that pertains to the bill, then some of these fellows who do not understand what the discussion is about try to interrupt with a point of order. They can give it, but they cannot take it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed in order.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, we were discussing this labor bill, and the gentleman from Georgia made the statement that because of the fact that certain accusations had been made in reference to the party in power in Pennsylvania, which is the best administration we have had for a great many years—on labor and jobs. A great Governor is James.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I renew my point of order.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have order.

Mr. HOOK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. HOOK. To insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOK. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not confining himself to his amendment.

Mr. TABER. May I be heard, Mr. Chairman? The gentleman from Pennsylvania had not concluded his sentence so that anybody could tell whether he is speaking to the bill or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK] would keep his seat long enough so that we could get to the point and be able to explain this amendment, he would probably be able to see the point, but if anybody is so dense—then I am sorry for him.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I renew my point of order.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, the new dealers can give it but they cannot take it. Their day is about over, and over for good, we hope.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read and printed in the RECORD, down to line 20 on page 17, which relates to the C. C. C., with the right on the part of any Member to offer any amendment if he so desires. I am not advised that anyone desires to submit amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. TABER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all authorized and necessary expenses to carry into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish a Civilian Conservation Corps, and for other purposes," approved June 28, 1937, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; the purchase and exchange of lawbooks, books of reference, periodicals, and newspapers; rents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; the purchase (including exchange), operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes; hire, with or without personal services, of work animals, animal-drawn and motor-propelled vehicles, and watercraft; printing and binding; travel expenses, including not to exceed $2,000 for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the work of the Corps when specifically authorized by the Director; construction, improvement, repair, and maintenance of buildings, but the cost of any building erected hereunder shall not exceed $25,000; and all other necessary expenses; of which $143,130,000 shall be available only for pay, subsistence, clothing (and repair thereof), transportation, and hospitalization of enrollees; and $325,000 may be expended in the District of Columbia for salaries and expenses of the office of the Director; $230,000,000: Provided, That an enrollee in the Civilian Conservation Corps, or member, or former member of the Military Establishment, who shall furnish blood from his or her veins for transfusion to the veins of an enrollee or discharged enrollee of the Civilian Conservation Corps undergoing treatment in a Government or civilian hospital authorized to treat such patient, shall be entitled to be paid therefor a reasonable sum not to exceed $50 for each of such transfusions undergone: Provided further, That the Director may authorize the exchange of motor-propelled and horse-drawn vehicles, tractors, road equipment, and boats, and parts, accessories, tires, or equipment thereof, in whole or in part payment for vehicles, tractors, road equipment, or boats, or parts, accessories, tires, or equipment of such vehicles, tractors, road equipment, or boats which the Corps has acquired: Provided further, That expenditures under the several classes of objects of expenditure for which this appropriation is available shall not exceed by more than 10 percent the amounts estimated for such objects of expenditure by classes, in the schedule for the fiscal year 1941 appearing in the Budget for such fiscal year under this head, and any such excess must be approved in writing by the Federal Security Administrator in such amounts as he shall designate: Provided further, That the foregoing proviso shall not apply, to whatever extent the President shall direct, in the event of an emergency declared, by the President, to exist.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCRUGHAM: On page 18, lines 14 and 18:

On line 14, strike out "$143,130,000" and insert "$150,000,000."

On line 18, strike out "$230,000,000" and insert "$240,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield to see if we can reach an agreement as to time on this matter?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. What time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I have no suggestion.

Mr. TARVER. Would 30 minutes be sufficient?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. As far as I am concerned; yes.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some time.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 30 minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. ELLIS, and Mr. HOOK rose.

Mr. TARVER. There are no amendments except with reference to the amount, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada covers that point. I think 30 minutes should be sufficient.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment increasing the amount from $230,000,000 to $280,000,000.

Mr. TARVER. I say all the debate will relate to the question of amount. Therefore it seems to me this is a reasonable time. There are no amendments except those which will relate to the amount, as I understand it.

I modify the request, Mr. Chairman, to make it 45 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 45 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this is a very important provision in this bill and we should have at least 1 hour of discussion on this subject.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, in deference to my colleague, who has been very cooperative in connection with this bill in all of its phases, I modify my request and I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 1 hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] will offer an amendment which may perhaps develop to be a better amendment than the one now offered. I do not want all the time put on this amendment and have the gentleman from Oklahoma deprived of any time on his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the unanimous-consent request, the time is not devoted entirely to this amendment, but to the paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, the increase sought in this amendment will not increase the total appropriation carried in the bill to exceed the total Budget estimate. I wish that fact to be distinctly understood, although it is not an essential feature. This amendment, if carried, will permit operation of a minimum of 55 additional C. C. C. camps and the employment of at least 10,000 additional enrollees. If the C. C. C. item as carried in the bill is adopted, it means abandonment of 273 camps, including 27 veteran camps. It will mean that about 168,000 worthy boys such as made application for enrollment in the C. C. C. camps as of January 1, 1940, will practically be denied, even the hope of future enrollment, unless Congress permits new vacancies to occur. If there lies a choice between reducing our vast civilian and military bureaucracies by the relatively small amounts proposed, or in giving another chance to 10,000 or more unemployed boys for useful employment, I do not think that any Member in this House should hesitate in making the latter choice.

Acceptance of the proposed amendment will still permit all reasonable demands for economy in appropriations to be fulfilled, and many thousands of boys will be given an opportunity for employment and to learn useful trades.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. If the gentleman's amendment carries, how many camps below the present number will we lose?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. A minimum of 55 camps will be added; 273 is the total number proposed to be destroyed. So subtract 55 from 273 and that will give you the result.

Mr. PITTENGER. You mean that even with your amendment 218 camps will be abolished?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Exactly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Would the gentleman favor a continuance of the present number of C. C. C. camps?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Certainly, I favor the continuance of all of them, but inasmuch as the subcommittee feels bound to keep within total Budget estimates, by direction of the Appropriations Committee, I offer this amendment, but I expect the total to be raised by further amendment to enable all of the camps to be retained.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. In the event the gentleman's amendment carries, how many reclamation camps will be restored?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I do not know, but on a pro rata basis about two of them. That is my best recollection.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. In what States?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I cannot tell what States will benefit by the restoration.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. And the figure that the gentleman is suggesting will still not raise this bill to the total of the Budget estimate.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The total of the Budget estimate for the entire bill will not be exceeded by this proposed amendment. We have kept within the reasonable expectations of economy. It is entirely unjust to place the burden of reductions so heavily on the C. C. C. administration.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield.

Mr. HARRINGTON. The fact still remains that we are going to lose 218 of these C. C. C. camps if the gentleman's amendment is not adopted.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes. Somewhere in the report, I think on page 18, the facts relating to these camps are set forth in detail. I have not the time to read it in full, but no proper minded man can read the fine record of accomplishment and realize the opportunity for employment which has been given to some two-million-odd boys, and not support the C. C. C. movement.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. Do I understand the gentleman to state that if his amendment is carried it will still be necessary to curtail the C. C. C. camps to the extent of the elimination of 218 existing camps?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes; and also some 45,000 enrollees will have to be dropped that otherwise would not be dropped.

Mr. KEEFE. And if the Budget estimate is carried through what will be the result?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Fifty-five thousand enrollees and 273 camps that heretofore have been carried will cease to be supported unless we adopt this or a substitute amendment increasing the funds provided, thus allowing more camps to continue in existence.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PITTENGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first inquire if any member of the committee desires recognition.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Dakota for 5 minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nevada has offered an amendment which does not increase the bill above the total that was recommended by the Budget for the total of the bill. The item for the C. C. C. camps that was recommended by the Budget is the item in the bill as it appears, but other cuts were made in the bill, so that the total bill as reported to the House is approximately $11,800,000 below the total Budget estimate.

The pending amendment to increase the C. C. C. item by ten million may not represent what a great many friends of the C. C. C. would like to see, but still it will save at least 55 camps and will keep the total of the bill within the amount recommended by the Budget for the bill as a whole.

Much has been said with respect to the value of the C. C. C. work and its benefits to veterans, to young men, and to the families who share in the pay checks. As you know, about $22 a month goes to the family of each enrollee. It means a lot. Not merely is the young man in camp getting a great deal out of his experience, but the family at home is kept from going on relief. The C. C. C. is not the millenium for the enrollee or his family, but under present conditions something can be said for any activity that helps young men. I had rather see them in work camps than in Army camps. I wish, however, to emphasize a different point. It is that most of the C. C. C. work is performed for the Federal Government. It is directly valuable to the Federal establishment. This is not true in the same degree of general relief expenditures. Most of the work done by the Civilian Conservation Corps is done on the public domain or on public property in the public forests and parks—all of it, I believe, except that performed for conservation districts. Thus the Federal Government itself receives a direct return from the improvement work that is done by the Civilian Conservation Corps.

Let me give you a concrete illustration. My home town is situated within the confines of a national forest. Last year during the dry season there were over 100 fires in that forest, yet the total acreage burned by these fires was less than 150 acres. In other words, the average area burned by a forest fire was less than 2 acres, because these boys were there, and no matter what work they were engaged in doing they were subject to call for the control of these fires. The experience in my district shows that the saving to the public domain, the actual saving in public property, by the work of the C. C. C. exceeded the cost of maintaining these camps. So this work should not be regarded as made work, but as distinctly and definitely of benefit for the protection and conservation of public property—most of it Uncle Sam's property.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. I know there are differences of opinion about it, but does not the gentleman feel that the fact that these young boys are employed in outdoor, wholesome exercise, eliminates a great deal of crime which otherwise might be committed in the United States?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes, that is true; and if the gentleman has had as I have, personal contact with some of these boys, he knows that many of them have received new ideals, and many have been trained in vocations through which they are better fitted to make a living than they otherwise would be.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. I am interested in ascertaining if anybody knows to what sections of the United States the additional camps provided for under the provisions suggested by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada would be allocated? If I could be sure that Vermont would get the four camps now being stricken from the list I might be interested in voting for the amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Of course, I have the same problem. I do not know whether any of the camps that will be saved will go to my particular district or not, but I do believe this work as a whole has justified itself and I am sure the authorities will make a fair distribution of the camps according to the funds made available.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY].

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEAVY as a substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. SCRUGHAM: Page 18, line 14, after the word "which", strike out "$143,130,000" and insert "$166,880,000", and in line 18, after the word "Director", strike out "$230,000,000" and insert "$280,000,000."

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, this substitute amendment is also being offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ELLIS] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON], both having demonstrated many times their friendship for the C. C. C. This substitute amendment will insure the keeping of the C. C. C. camps at the present level of 1,500 camps. It is $15,000,000 under the amount for this fiscal year, but by the practice of certain economies and by reason of the fact that these camps are generally established, we will maintain the camps as they are, 1,500 in number, and where they are at this time if the work being undertaken is not complete at the particular place where the camp is located. In this manner we will be able to avoid a reduction of enrollees anywhere in the United States for the coming year and still be able to save $15,000,000 in costs of this wonderful activity.

It is true that we will exceed the Budget slightly; there is no question about that; but the Budget cannot be held so sacred, nor must this Congress regard it so solemnly that we cannot change any item fixed by it. The Budget Bureau fills an important place in our Government, but it has never asserted that we as a Congress do not have final responsibility. The C. C. C. activity has directly touched the lives of more than two and one-half million boys. It has directly benefited 13,125,000 American people in their homes. Its record of accomplishment is one that men with far more ability than I have could not paint in hours of time. But more than the dollars-and-cents side of this picture is the human salvage side of it. Thousands and thousands of young men are now valuable, useful American citizens, whereas, if we had not had the C. C. C., hundreds of them—and I can say this from personal contact and experience in my work previous to coming here—would be occupying felons' cells and would have to go through the remainder of their lives branded as ex-convicts. Why, in 1 week in 1933, just before C. C. C. came into the picture, 9 boys appeared in my court in the city of Spokane and pleaded guilty to major criminal offenses, of crimes against property. In every case poverty and lack of a chance to get work was the controlling cause. Every one of these boys could have qualified for C. C. C. activity if it had been in effect. It was my painful duty to send those 9 young men, between the ages of 17 and 23, to State prison. The taxpayers of the State of Washington had to pay from $100 to $125 a month to keep them there, not taking into consideration the fact that the individual's life was ruined and his family shamed, and he has the gloomy prospect of going through life an ex-convict. Have we become so sordid that we measure human life and happiness entirely in terms of balanced financial budgets?

Are we going to stand back in order to say that we have saved $50,000,000 and tell thousands of deserving boys and other thousands of needy families, "We are going to cut you off in the interest of a balanced Budget"? This substitute should be agreed to. Again I reiterate, we save $15,000,000 over what we are spending this year, and we do not cut out a single camp.

Every time a camp is moved it costs this Government around $20,000. Every time one is constructed, it costs somewhere in the neighborhood of $60,000. Why let these beautiful camps, ready to serve the needy boys of this country, stand idle during this next year and many of the boys themselves allowed to go down the path to complete destruction?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. DEMPSEY. What is going to happen to the boys who are now employed if the reduction takes place?

Mr. LEAVY. They will be thrown out to become drifters. They will be a fertile field from which subversive groups will secure recruits.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And will we not have to increase the relief appropriations?

Mr. LEAVY. There is no question about that. Every one of these boys represents a needy family if he has family connections and if we take the family source of income away, then we will be adding to the relief burden.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. If the present bill is adopted without the pending amendment it will force 54,000 young men who are now in the C. C. C. camps out of those camps. Not only that, but in doing so it will place a very large percentage of those enrollees on relief, if it is possible for them to get on relief. It also will mean that a majority of the families of such boys will be forced on relief rolls.

Mr. LEAVY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ENGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ENGEL. Does the gentleman say all these boys come from relief families? That is not in accord with the testimony.

Mr. LEAVY. One of the prerequisites is that the boy shall be from a family that is needy and $22 of the $30 paid the boy goes back home to the family, or if no family connections, he must be personally in need.

Mr. ENGEL. The gentleman will find in the hearings that Mr. McIntee testified they did not all come from the relief rolls.

Mr. LEAVY. They may not be people who have been compelled to go on the relief rolls, but they are from families in straitened financial circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, I hope my substitute amendment will be agreed to. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PITTENGER].

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the substitute amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there are two national forests in the district I have the honor to represent. One of them is the Superior National Forest. I called the attention of the House the other day to what it meant to the United States Forest Service to have the C. C. C. camp in that area discontinued. I now wish to call attention to another national forest, the Chippewa National Forest, which is partially in the eighth district. There is a fine stand of timber in that forest, and it is worth millions of dollars. Under this new economy program it is proposed to discontinue C. C. C. camp No. 707 near Deer River, Minn., and take away from the United States Forest Service one of the finest fire-protection agencies it has. It is proposed by this economy program to scrap 273 camps throughout the United States and make it possible for forest fires to rage throughout regions where forests are located and destroy millions of dollars worth of timber belonging to the people of the United States. That is false economy.

I wish to subscribe to what the last speaker said with regard to the problem of unemployed youth. There is no more valuable agency of this Government than the Civilian Conservation Corps when it comes to offering unemployed young men an opportunity to earn money. I do not care about your theory and I do not care about your figures about administrative expense. I know what you say about those things. This appropriation ought to be increased by $50,000,000 if you are going to prevent the discontinuance of these 273 camps. Four of these camps are in the district I represent, and they ought to be continued.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PITTENGER. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Does not the gentleman agree that it is a good insurance policy to keep these camps at the full force now existing—if for no other reason—in order to save our national forests?

Mr. PITTENGER. I do.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I feel that it would be a serious mistake to cut down on this program. I have that opinion from the secretaries of the chambers of commerce in my State and from many substantial businessmen.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I shall insert in my remarks a letter from Mr. H. E. Wolfe, publisher of the Deer River News, of Deer River, Minn., near which C. C. C. camp No. 707 is located, indicating that if the Federal Government abolishes this camp a great mistake will have been made in removing fire protection to the forest. It is no theory that the camp may be abolished. Announcement has already gone out from persons who know to those who are interested that this camp is gone, and so are the other three camps in my district, and so are camps in other sections of this country where this program of youth rehabilitation and of affording opportunity to a young man to do something worth while, where the Government can help make an honest and clean citizen out of him, has been carried on. This program must be continued and this substitute amendment adopted, or else this Congress will make one of the major mistakes of this session.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PITTENGER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Does the gentleman have any knowledge of whether or not any soil-conservation camps, which have been doing such good work, will be continued if this appropriation is increased by $50,000,000, as contemplated by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. PITTENGER. No; I cannot answer that question.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PITTENGER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I was going to ask whether or not the work of the C. C. C. camps for the benefit of the agricultural sections of the country would be continued if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. PITTENGER. I understand, and I believe my information is correct, that if the substitute amendment is adopted the Civilian Conservation Corps will carry on the present program.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. We have in Ohio a number of the soil-conservation camps of the C. C. C., and they have been doing good work in the agricultural districts. I am informed that the abandonment of them means that the work will not be completed and that much of the investment already made will be lost.

Mr. PITTENGER. I may say that if those camps are included in the present program, then I do not know of any reason they would not be continued. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the letter to which I referred earlier in my remarks is as follows:

DEER RIVER, MINN., March 20, 1940.

Hon. W. A. PITTENGER,
Representative Eighth Minnesota District,
Room 244, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PITTENGER: Ever since it was first rumored here, which I announced in my paper a few weeks ago, that Company 707, C. C. C., was to be taken out of the Chippewa National Forest, I have been waiting for people to come to their senses and set the order aside.

Mr. PITTENGER, this order simply must be vacated. It is unbelievable that the C. C. C. heads should make such a disastrous decision.

Company 707 is now the only one in western Itasca County. It is located right close to the eastern line of the most heavily timbered portion of the Chippewa Forest. Within the range of its patrol, stand more then 200,000,000 feet of the finest timber in the Chippewa, most of it virgin. It must not be left to the mercy of spring fires.

This timber, lying northeast, north, and northwest of Lake Winnibigoshish, is probably the best in Minnesota. This region is a favorite spot for tourists to visit, thousands coming every year with the opening of the fishing season in May. This increases danger of fires, always great enough. It is a matter of record that Company 707 has, during the fire seasons of the spring and fall, been called upon as many as six times in a single day for aid in fighting fires.

It is also a matter of record that the Chippewa is the most productive and profitable forest in the Lake States region. In substantiation of that statement, I am enclosing a release from the regional office, sent out last December. And the best district in the Chippewa is that of Cut Foot Sioux, in which Company 707 is located.

Read this release. It is from forest authority. Then read newspaper clippings enclosed. If they do not afford ample reasons why Company 707 should be kept here, then I do not know what argument could.

May I implore you to lay this before the proper authority at once? If nothing more can be done, ask them at least to leave the camp here until July 1 to carry us over the spring fire season.

The Government can afford this. It is just good plain business sense. Left without protection, this area could have a single fire that would do more damage than it would cost to keep the camp there. That statement is amply proved by conditions which existed before the C. C. C. camps came in.

Very truly yours,

H. E. WOLFE,
Publisher, Deer River News.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the substitute amendment. Should the Committee unfortunately reject that amendment, I shall support the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Nevada.

I wish to congratulate the members of the Committee on Appropriations on the splendid arguments they offered here this afternoon in support of these amendments. Specifically I refer to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY]. As always, in this instance they have risen to the occasion and shown that they are the friends of the youth and the needy of this country.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARE. May I suggest that the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] also made a grand argument, and he is a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I thank the gentleman. I will say to the gentleman that just as he asked me to yield to him I was going to specifically mention the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], who, as the gentleman has just said, made a most convincing and elaborate argument in favor of the youth and needy. I may say to the gentleman from South Carolina that the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] has always shown his sympathy and supported all measures which had to do with the relief and betterment of the condition of the young and poor, and today, stronger than ever, he did himself proud in their behalf.

There are 4,000,000 unemployed youths in this country. If the choice arises as to persons being idle, it is safer to have a man of 60 or above walking the streets without employment than it is to have a youth in his late teens or his early twenties unable to secure employment or make a living or find a place to sleep and a place to eat and hungry. The young man is going to get those things, and if in order to do so he finds his way into the penitentiary it is our fault and not the fault of the boy, because he is a victim of circumstances over which he has no control. How well I know, as I have defended in cases like this.

One-third of the State I have the honor to represent is owned by the Federal Government, and nearly two-fifths of the State is in national forests. I have personal knowledge from observation of how these boys protect the forests. I well remember one day a year or so ago when I was on a ranch that I unfortunately own in a territory that is very sparsely settled. Looking over toward the mountains early one morning I saw smoke rising toward the heavens from virgin forest that fire had theretofore never touched. Before sunset that evening the flames were licking the topmost limbs of those magnificent trees and spreading fast, leaving destruction in its wake. During that night, I may say, four or five gray trucks wended their way up to this territory loaded, if you please, with C. C. C. boys, and before the sun set upon the next day, that fire was out. That magnificant forest was saved. These young men put it out at the danger of losing their lives. We could not get any of the citizens over there to go to these fires because they were afraid of being destroyed by the fire and we had to rely upon these C. C. C. boys. What is true in this instance is true in many other instances of the same kind throughout our country. In all ways they have proven their worth. Our country is getting value received and more. Also we are making character.

I hope the amendment will be carried. [Applause.]

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, where the President first got the idea of the C. C. C. I do not know, but wherever he got it there is little doubt that it is the most popular of all the emergency activities of his administration. I have heard some Republicans say that it is the only good piece of New Deal legislation that has been offered during the present administration. I would not go so far as to concur entirely in that view, but I have heard a great many Republicans praise the C. C. C. who are opposed to the New Deal generally, and I have never heard any serious objection made against the C. C. C. by Republicans, either in Congress or out of it.

You have heard a number of gentlemen speak here within the last few minutes from the land-grant States. The land-grant States are the 11 Western States which came into the Union with some strings attached to their admission. In my own State, for example, 56 percent of the area of the State of Oregon belongs to the Federal Government. This Government ownership was one of the conditions of its admission, and the people of our State are not allowed to tax that federally owned area in order to raise the revenue to defray the expenses of the State and local governments. This is the situation which obtains largely in all of the 11 land-grant States.

Now, in these States particularly the Civilian Conservation Corps performs a very valuable and a very necessary work by building trails in the forests, by protecting our forests from fire, and by doing a great deal of useful work which would not otherwise be done and which, probably, could not otherwise be done. Most of the C. C. C. camps in these States are located in the national forests, which comprise a large portion of this Federal domain.

In my own State of Oregon, unless this appropriation is increased, 15 very useful camps are slated, under the curtailment program, to be discontinued. I have made a personal investigation of every one of these 15 camps, most of which are in my own district, and of my own knowledge I know that these camps are all doing excellent work, and that their discontinuance would result in very great detriment to the areas in which they are located.

As I said a moment ago, there is no criticism of the C. C. C. From the viewpoint of useful work, it comes near being a perfect organization, and from the viewpoint of relief its record is not surpassed by any governmental agency. The boys and the families of the boys who are employed in the C. C. C. camps are in need of relief, and if it were not for the C. C. C. the taxpayers of this country would be obliged to raise the money to give this relief in some other form. The C. C. C. not only gives the relief to the boys and to their families, but furnishes to the country and to the Government, on whose property the camps are located, a great deal of useful and valuable work.

Like everyone else I favor economy, but I think by abolishing or curtailing some of the useless activities of the Government we can practice economy and still not handicap the functions of this very necessary agency. [Applause.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I shall, of course, support the substitute amendment to bring this appropriation back to the point where the C. C. C. can operate and function. My purpose in doing this is that it seems to me if the Civilian Conservation Corps has in the past been doing a good job and an adequate job they should be permitted to go ahead. If they have not, then let us wipe them out entirely upon the basis that it is a useless expenditure of public funds to carry on their work.

Most of the cuts that will be made in this bill, I understand, will be made in what is called park camps. Oklahoma will suffer very little from a reduction of soil-conservation camps. We have no forests in Oklahoma which these C. C. C. boys can protect, but we have forests of human beings down there and there are forests of human beings all over the United States who are not being destroyed by the ravages of forest fires that wipe out timber, but who are being destroyed by the ravages of unemployment, and the most eloquent argument that can be made in support of this substitute amendment is contained in the report from this committee that now recommends the reduction in the appropriation.

I quote briefly from the report of the Committee on Appropriations under the heading of Civilian Conservation Corps:

The Civilian Conservation Corps began its work in 1933 and from the time the first camp was established on April 17 of that year until February 1 of the current year 2,615,000 young persons have been given employment, and on a basis of estimates, something over 13,000,000 persons have received direct benefits through the program.

The enrollees receive $8 per month and the balance of $22 is sent to their families. As a matter of statistical interest, during the period the C. C. C. has been operating more than 1,700,000,000 forest trees have been planted; forest-stand improvement has been completed on nearly 3,500,000 acres; fire-hazard reduction has been prosecuted on nearly 2,000,000 acres; enrollees had devoted over 5,000,000 man-days to fighting forest fires; 75,000 miles of telephone lines have been constructed; 109,000 miles of truck trails and minor trails have been completed with nearly 500,000 miles maintained; saving check dams numbering nearly 5,000,000 have been built to prevent erosion; and tree-, plant-, and pest-control operations have been carried on over 18,600,000 acres. The camps are operated under the general supervision of the Civilian Conservation Corps with immediate supervision of the camps in the hands of the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture and the various bureaus under those Departments. The War Department acts as fiscal officer in the program and furnishes all supplies, equipment, and medical care.

I agree with my friend, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] that the Republicans will surely support this amendment, because they must agree that the Civilian Conservation Corps has done a good job. [Applause.]

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to change the figure in my substitute amendment from "$166,880,000" to "$176,880,000," as there is an error in my calculation. I do this in order to maintain the same ratio in these increases.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object, to find out if we allow this whether it would preserve the status quo.

Mr. LEAVY. It would.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], as modified by the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 14, after the word "which", strike out "$143,130,000" and insert "$176,880,000"; also in line 18, after the word "Director", strike out "$230,000,000" and insert "$280,000,000."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. I think it is advisable at this time that the position of the subcommittee be stated. Let us understand at the beginning of the discussion of this subject matter that this subcommittee has made a smaller reduction below the Budget estimates in comparison to the total amount of the bill than any subcommittee reporting an appropriaiton bill to this House during the present session. The reductions below the Budget in this bill aggregate only about $12,000,000 out of total estimates of approximately $966,000,000. If gentlemen will read the report, they will find that the committee is not only not antagonistic to the C. C. C., but is highly enthusiastic about its work. Personally I do not believe, and I think I am speaking the sentiments of all of the members of the subcommittee, that there has been any work undertaken during recent years by the Government which has been more productive of good, both in the conservation of our natural resources, and in the conservation of our human resources. The committee has allowed the full amount of the Budget estimate. In addition to that, it has added $6,000,000 to the item for the pay, subsistence, and hospitalization of enrollees.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I cannot yield at this time. That will have the effect of adding at least 10,000 to the number of enrollees, and will amount to an addition of 55 camps beyond the 1,227 camps estimated for by the Budget. It is true that we do not add anything to the lump sum total of the appropriation, but in the examinations of the witnesses which we had, it was clearly developed that it is possible to make savings in expenses to a greater amount than the $6,000,000, without in any way crippling the administrative part of this organization, and that the proposed $230,000,000 can properly take care of at least 1,282 camps.

I am sure that it is the purpose of the House to cooperate with the committee in an effort to bring about a reduction in the administrative expenses. It will be observed from the hearings that the estimated expense per enrollee, including all items, in the next fiscal year, is approximately $1,000. The cost of every enrollee for pay and subsistence items alone is approximately $600; or, in other words, the administrative cost, equipment cost, and other costs in addition to pay, subsistence, and hospitalization items, averages, according to the estimates submitted—or will average for the next fiscal year—$400 per enrollee. If you will examine the evidence we took day after day, you will find that if this appropriation could be broken down into the various activities it covers, there are many portions of those activities where very substantial reductions could be made. In addition to that, the substitution of civilian supervisory employees for Army Reserve officers which has now been accomplished, is estimated to bring a reduction in cost for the next fiscal year of $3,800,000. Yet there is no reflection in the Budget estimates of that saving. Last year the Civilian Conservation Corps had four and a half million dollars which it did not expend. This year, they have failed to expend during the first 6 months of the present fiscal year, approximately $4,000,000 less than one-half of the appropriation for the present fiscal year, although they have maintained 1,500 camps. We have not only no desire to cripple the work of this corps but we want to help carry it on in as great volume as reasonably possible, but we do think if we are to have any economy, that we must be willing to economize in those things near and dear to us, which we all value very highly, because if we do not economize except in things we do not like, we will never accomplish a substantial saving.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, of course, I shall support this pending amendment. In fact, I gave notice several days ago that I would offer such an amendment if someone else did not offer it.

If this amendment is adopted, it means that every C. C. C. camp in the United States will continue to operate. If it is not adopted, then there is no use of our kidding ourselves; there will be a closing of 273 camps in the United States, even though the subcommittee made a heroic effort to open 55 of those camps on paper, without any concrete evidence on which to base such an unusual action.

Now, who is the best authority on this matter of the actual expense of operating C. C. C. camps? It seems reasonable to say that Mr. McEntee, the able, active, and popular Director of the C. C. C., is considered the best authority on the subject. The committee has complimented Mr. McEntee on the savings he has made. The committee has made it plain that he has done a good job. I have asked Mr. McEntee the point-blank question if he can do what the committee says he can do—keep 55 camps open without additional funds. I placed in the RECORD yesterday Mr. McEntee's reply to me over his own signature. He says in his letter:

The action taken is administratively impractical and will, I fear, seriously interfere with the craftsmanshiplike job the corps has been performing over the last 7 years.

Again he says:

To operate 55 more camps with no increase in funds simply means that all camps will be very seriously curtailed with regard to proper expenditure for education, training, supplies, equipment, and competent supervisory personnel.

Of course, we could cut down the price of the meals these fine young men are eating. We could cut 2 to 4 cents off of their meals and make a pitiful little saving. We could cut down on the clothing they wear, but I am sure that Congress does not want to do that, and Congress is not going to do anything like that in the name of economy.

Further Mr. McEntee says:

The same is true of the 10-percent limitation which the committee has added to the appropriation language. In addition to other arguments against this 10-percent limitation clause, it may be stated that the bookkeeping cost or accounting cost of the Civilian Conservation Corps will be considerably increased. These blockages will constitute a separate appropriation in the eyes of the Comptroller General.

Then he goes on to speak about this overhead that we hear so much about. Many people think that overhead is just the overhead of the camp, the personnel, educational director, and so forth, but a great deal of this overhead is behind the lines. Some of this overhead is down here at the regional office of the Forest Service. Several hundred people are employed there. Mr. McEntee says further about overhead:

The additional accounting work will run into a very large sum. It is our opinion that the recommended changes, if put into effect, would be likely to disrupt the corps.

I submit if we want to keep these camps open we will support this amendment, and if we do not we will vote against it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, to do anything less than is proposed by this substitute amendment—prepared by myself and offered by the gentleman from Washington, a member of the committee—is to mark the beginning of the end of the C. C. C. The committee has proposed that this reduction can be had and 55 camps retained over and above the reduction that would come if 273 camps were deleted. The Administrator of the C. C. C. says it cannot be done. Then to follow the committee is certainly to eliminate 273 camps and mark the beginning of the end. If the first amendment which was offered this afternoon is adopted, that means a substantial reduction in the number of camps, and that, too, means the beginning of the end of the C. C. C.

The committee itself and the chairman of the subcommittee both make eloquent appeals actually for this amendment, when they say in their report, and when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] says here on the floor substantially the same thing—that the C. C. C. in this country has planted more than 1,700,000,000 forest trees; that the C. C. C. has accomplished fire-hazard reductions in this country on 2,000,000,000 acres of American forests; that 75,000 miles of telephone lines have been constructed by the C. C. C. boys; that 109,000 miles of truck trails and minor trails have been constructed by the C. C. C. boys; and when they say that 5,000,000,000—not 5,000,000 but 5,000,000,000—saving check dams have been constructed in this Nation to prevent soil erosion by the C. C. C. The C. C. C. boys of this Nation have been adding to the capital wealth of the United States. This money has not been wasted; no, indeed. We have been building ourselves a greater nation.

Gentlemen, when you turn 54,600 of these boys out of these camps onto the streets, representing a quarter of a million people, you have not only added to the relief rolls of this Nation but you have added to the crime rolls of this Nation. Some of these days the time may come when these boys who today are in despair and walking the streets will be in the majority in this country, and if they react like the youth of Europe have reacted this democracy may no longer be safe. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, certainly not a publication which could be branded new dealish in any manner, has this to say of the Civilian Conservation Corps program:

Hundreds of thousands of unemployed youth, who under similar conditions in China or even Mexico would have recruited bandit armies, were taken and made a social asset instead of a social liability through the C. C. C.

Nonpartisan support for this amendment should be given this afternoon because it will bring about the continuation of a program not only to build better land, but also better youth. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the Leavy substitute amendment. I wish to strongly urge that the cut in funds for the Civilian Conservation Corps be restored in order to maintain the present number of camps now in operation.

Since its inception, I have been an enthusiastic supporter of the C. C. C. program and believe that its success in the conservation of youth and natural resources has made it one of the outstanding achievements of the present Administration which has met with almost universal approval. The C. C. C. is rendering a real service, not only in the constructive work it is doing, but in the development of high ideals of citizenship among our youth. As a Nation we are giving more and more recognition to the inherent value of our youth and have come to appreciate how necessary it is to the welfare of the state that our young citizens be healthfully and profitably employed. In addition to actual work accomplishments in drainage, forestry, soil erosion, recreational parks, emergency wildlife feeding, stream and lake protection, and so forth, it has stimulated a new interest on the part of States, private individuals, and other Federal bodies in conservation. For instance, in Oklahoma, where no State parks existed prior to the coming of the C. C. C., we now have a chain of eight such areas. This program affords many unemployed veterans who are unable to obtain employment in private industry, an opportunity to provide for the needs of their families and at the same time render a useful service to the community and to the Government.

I understand if this cut in appropriation is made, it will mean that 273 camps will have to be abandoned and Oklahoma will lose 9. My district is scheduled to lose 3 of the 7 camps now in operation.

I have received over 300 letters and telegrams from civic organizations, educators, ministers, and prominent businessmen of the towns where these camps are to be terminated, and would like to read some excerpts from a few of them:

Abandonment of the camp at this time would be about as logical as starting into constructing a home, laying the foundation, erecting walls, and then moving in or abandoning it without putting on a roof. I am sure no one would call that kind of procedure sane economy. Our State treasury has just issued a warrant paying for more land, completing approach of this park area from previous boundaries to the river. If abandonment is to be an inflexible rule once a camp is designated, why could not such a step have been taken in time to prevent such extra investment, which, by the way, not only lies there idle but also removed perhaps 80 acres of land from McCurtain County tax rolls? Furthermore, how about the minor personnel of our country's citizens who are now constructively earning for themselves, learning trades, etc., which would be discharged and perhaps become roving waifs? I recently attended a citizenship program out at the camp one evening for those youths arriving at a majority in the last 90 days. I wish you could have been present and seen those young men in the vim, vigor, and vitality of youth, the earnest hope expressed by their faces.

Unemployment is one of the greatest problems in our country, so what will become of the thousands left jobless? There were 20 illiterate boys at the Beaver's Bend Park camp last year, and they are learning more in camp than they would at any other place.

The dissolution of the Beaver's Bend C. C. C. camp would impose upon the people of this part of the State a great hardship by forcing many boys out on the highways looking for jobs that do not exist for them and for the families that would be left in destitute circumstances were it not for the money sent home each month by these boys, meager as it is.

A magnificent road has been built; camp cabins, water system, and sewer connections are almost finished, and fencing is well under way. Should this camp be abandoned now, all that money, time, and labor will be lost. On the other hand, if the camp could be maintained long enough to finish the improvements already begun, in a short time it would be able to meet its own expenses.

If these forest camps are ended it is going to greatly affect the preservation of our forests and game, the vacation spots of Oklahoma, and the general trade and commerce of our particular locality.

The businessmen of McCurtain County have been out quite a sum of money on the purchase of this park, and if abandoned now we feel that it would remain forever an unfinished monument. If the camp could remain there for 2 more years the park would be in a state of completion and would be something of which the entire State would be proud.

Two hundred boys and families are being aided in Nashoba camp and doing excellent work. Four years' needed work in view. It would be detrimental to county to move this camp, as this is only camp in county. Forest protection is necessary, as it is county's principal resources.

We are for economy, but to discontinue a program on which the work is not completed would be a waste. It is no use to review to you that Lake Murray State Park contain more area than all other State parks in Oklahoma. The program of roads around the lake and to picnic grounds is not completed. Then there are a number of cabins started but about one-half completed.

I wish to give a brief summary of the work done by the C. C. C. camps in the Third District of Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] for 3 minutes.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I want to make just one point: In my judgment, with the economic condition of the country as it is today, a sound minimum rule for this Congress to follow would be to say that it was not going to cut the employment of anybody at the present time. Unless you adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington it means, as has already been stated, that you are going to deprive some 50,000 C. C. C. enrollees of employment at a time when employment in private industry is not expanding but going down. You will be contributing to the same tendency unless you adopt this amendment. I believe most earnestly that it should be adopted because I think, as has been stated by many other gentlemen, that this program has been a real character-building program. Not only has it been that, but it has saved the forests and soil of America. In my own country it has prevented forest-fire damage of an inestimable amount. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman know of a single program this administration has adopted that has been more successful than this one?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I think it is one of the very best and finest things that has been done by any government at any time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman has mentioned the unemployed rolls of the country. The gentleman knows, does he not, that on January 1 last there were 165,000 unemployed eligible youth who applied for positions as enrollees in the C. C. C.? With only 60,000 places open, this meant that 105,000 of the eligibles had to be turned down.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is right; and unless we take action to increase the appropriation for this item, we will be adding 55,000 more to that number.

In the year 1937 Congress did exactly the same sort of thing that is proposed here today by opponents of this amendment. The consequence of it was one of the sharpest drops in industrial production and activity that this country has ever known.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to my able and distinguished colleague from San Diego.

Mr. IZAC. I wonder if my colleague is not also aware that 70 Members of this House are now engaged in an effort to solve the unemployment problem at the very time it is proposed to take 50,000 enrollees from the C. C. C.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I may say that these 70 Members, of whom I am proud to be one, are working mighty hard on that job. We believe the solution of the unemployment problem is the main task of this Congress. I know the gentleman from California [Mr. IZAC] believes that, for he is one of the most earnest Members of our unemployment conference, of which he spoke.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the gentleman know of that number how many enrollees are returnable enrollees in the current year?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I am sorry, but I do not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no national forests in my district, but I am interested in this amendment and I am for it. It seems to me it is a good dollars-and-cents proposition, for when we study the crime figures we find that the crime bill amounts to $15,000,000,000 a year and that half the criminals are under 21 years of age. This is an average of $3,750 apiece. Is it not a good investment to pay the cost of keeping these boys in the C. C. C. rather than to have to pay the higher cost of those who might otherwise go bad?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. There can be no question about it. I may say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I have been a school teacher most of my life and that a good many of the boys I used to teach in school have found in the C. C. C. program an opportunity to work to build up their physique, to help their families, and to gain a feeling that they are pulling their own weight in the boat of our national life. My only suggestion and hope is that the vocational training opportunities in the C. C. C. camps might be extended.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEEFE], a member of the committee, for 5 minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take the entire 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I addressed the House yesterday on the subject of the N. Y. A. and stated clearly my position in reference to that organization and the work it is doing. I also stated rather briefly, in answer to a question of the gentleman from South Dakota, my opinion in reference to the C. C. C. Everything I said in reference to the N. Y. A. yesterday can be said for the work of the C. C. C., so far as I am concerned.

I think the report of the committee itself very definitely and clearly indicates that the committee feels that the work of the Civilian Conservation Corps at least represents one contribution to the welfare of our youth in this country that no very serious-minded person may challenge. The serious question, however, is: Are we going to stultify ourselves by standing here at one time arguing in support of a proposed amendment because it is claimed the President and his Budget asked for an amount, and at other times using the argument that we ought to increase the Budget which has been sent here by the same individual?

I stated at that time that it was my firm conviction from what I had learned that there would not be serious objection on the part of the head of the budgetary department of this Government if this appropriation for the C. C. C. were perhaps increased, but I want to propound the inquiry again, Why do we not have presented to this Congress an honest Budget? Why did not the President and his Budget committee bring before this Congress a Budget asking for enough money to take care of the existing needs of the C. C. C.? Why is it necessary always for the Congress to go beyond the budgetary estimates in connection with great humanitarian movements such as this in order to carry out the will of the people of this country?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Of course, the gentleman knows as well as anyone that under the Constitution appropriations must originate in the House of Representatives?

Mr. KEEFE. Oh, I understand that appropriations must originate in the House of Representatives. It seems that there is not any particular necessity for a Budget at all, because we hear people say every day, "We do not intend to pay any attention to it." When they want the Budget to support their contention, then they rely on it, but when they do not like the way the Budget handles the thing then they say, "Pay no attention to it." It seems we ought to have an honest Budget.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. May not the President and the Director of the Budget very honestly assume that the Congress is going to exercise its constitutional powers on the question of appropriations and not rely entirely on what they say?

Mr. KEEFE. I think that is very clear in this particular case, and I think it is very clear in a number of other cases. Why have a Budget at all unless it is an honest Budget? Why have one at all unless it is honest?

Mr. O'CONNOR. They may think it is an honest Budget but in the final analysis it is up to the Congress.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes; in the final analysis it is up to the Congress, and I am going to exercise my right as a Member of Congress to vote what I think this organization ought to have, Budget or no Budget. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senate of the United States has on at least one occasion voted to make this program a permanent part of our governmental policy. The House did not do so. Does the gentleman think it might be advisable for this body to give a permanency to this program?

Mr. KEEFE. I am not prepared to pass on that question yet. I hope the time will come in America when we are able to offer something else to the youth of America beside the chance to work in C. C. C. camps, and I think that time is rapidly approaching, if you please. When we abandon some of the wild extravaganzas of the New Deal and give some inspiration to the people of this country, we will not have to make it a permanent agency of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN].

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOREN as an amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. SCRUGHAM: On page 18, line 18, after the word "Director", strike out "$240,000,000", as proposed by the Scrugham amendment, and insert "$300,000,000."

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to announce at this time that my amendment to the amendment will give the House an opportunity to do what it ought to do; that is, increase rather than decrease the C. C. C. There was a time when we had the C. C. C. on a proper footing and this will put it back where it was 1 year ago today. If we want to do what should be done we will expand the C. C. C. and make it permanent. Everyone knows it is a good investment. Everyone admits it is one of the best Government programs. Does the Congress have the courage to trade one battleship for 300 C. C. C. camps. I am giving you a chance to do that, or, better still, I am giving you an opportunity to trade 6,000 useless bureaucrats for 300 C. C. C. camps to benefit 60,000 boys, 60,000 families, and 300 soil-conservation districts. Let us make the trade and vote this amendment. Let us economize on the battleships or bureaucrats.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL].

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, let no one here today mistake the issue. The President of the United States submitted a budget to this Congress, and in that budget he told us the amount of money he thought we ought to allow for the various projects or activities of Government. He also told us the amount of revenue we would receive, and that it would require approximately a half billion dollars in new taxes to balance the Budget without raising the debt limitation.

The Appropriations Committee has worked hard, in the face of criticism, and I may say even abuse, in trying to make a saving of a half billion dollars so that it would not be necessary for the Congress to pass either a tax bill or legislation increasing our debt limit.

Mr. Chairman, the issue here today is not the question as to whether or not we are going to raise the C. C. C. ten, fifty, or seventy-five million dollars. The issue is whether this House is going to stand behind the Appropriations Committee in its effort to reduce or maintain the Budget estimates and make unnecessary the passing of a tax bill or legislation increasing the debt limit.

Mr. Chairman, I have a 3,000,000-acre national-forest area in my district. I have C. C. C. camps that will be discontinued if this Budget estimate is maintained, but I am going to support the President's recommendation of $230,000,000 just the same. Let us see whether we can save enough money for the additional 55 camps the committee provides for. Thirty-two thousand civilian employees this year are receiving over $58,000,000 in pay, while the 270,000 enrollees are receiving approximately $100,000,000 in pay. There are from 14 to 16 civilian employees in each camp, drawing as high as $3,600 per year each. If we could cut off from the pay roll of each camp 2 of these employees in the higher brackets, you would have a saving of $5,000,000 to $6,000,000, or the amount the committee transferred from overhead to the enrollee pay-subsistence item.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. I have only 5 minutes. Everyone has been talking for the increase and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] and I are practically the only ones giving the other side of the question. I cannot yield.

In 1937 the C. C. C. made a survey of the 350,000 enrollees with this result: 55 percent of the enrollees came from rural areas or cities with a population under 2,500; 12 percent of them came from cities with a population between 2,500 and 10,000. Only 33 percent of them came from cities of 10,000 or over. If this bill were passed as submitted by the President, of the 221,000 enrollees there will be about 73,000 coming from cities of 10,000 and over. To say that these 73,000 all come from the slums and the pool rooms is absolutely ridiculous. The 1930 census shows that we have 9,000,000 boys between the ages of 17 and 25, so we would be helping about 1 out of 130 of these boys if they all came from the city slums which, of course, they do not. We gave the C. C. C. an additional 25 percent last year, adding 300 camps to the Budget estimate. They justified $16,326,296 for supplies and materials but they spent $18,645,062. We gave them $8,965,026 for travel of persons and they spent $11,718,475. For repairs and alterations we gave them $10,518,056, and they spent $15,114,133. For structure and parts we gave them $9,330,777, and they spent $10,285,159. For equipment we gave them $4,198,486, and they spent $12,635,879, or three times the amount we gave them. If, in the face of these facts, Mr. McEntee cannot save enough out of this appropriation for 55 extra camps he had better get out and let somebody come in who can do it.

The record shows that only 23 percent of the total amount of money appropriated for the C. C. C. since its beginning went to the families of the enrollees. The record shows on page 85 of the hearings on my questioning that they did not go into the question of relief in selecting these boys, and I do not believe they should. Nowhere near all these boys are taken from families on the relief rolls. I know most of the rural boys are not. Anyone who thinks he is going to reduce the relief rolls by increasing this appropriation is just kidding himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEAVY) there were—ayes 108, noes 87.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. SHEPPARD and Mr. LEAVY.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 134, noes 100.

So the substitute amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] as amended by the substitute amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. If this amendment is now defeated, that will defeat the Leavy amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. So if this amendment is voted down, we will defeat the amendment that was just adopted.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 104, noes 103.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. SHEPPARD and Mr. SCRUGHAM.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 134, noes 109.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this is not a pro forma amendment. I do not offer amendments often on the floor of the House and I never offered one more seriously in my life than the one I have just offered, and I do not yield to any Member of the House of Representatives in my appreciation of the importance of the Civilian Conservation Corps and the work that it has done.

Last year the Budget cut the C. C. C. $50,000,000, and I presented a joint resolution, and the Congress adopted it, reinstating that amount. I would be perfectly willing to join in any kind of a movement to prevent the reduction of these C. C. C. camps, but I say to my colleagues here today, in humility, respecting your judgment as I respect my own, that I think what we have just done is a tragic thing in the history of this country.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. No; I have only 5 minutes.

Now, put the C. C. C. out of it. This action has shown a reversal of the spirit which the Congress adopted in the beginning to try to live within the Budget estimates, to try to hold down appropriations and to try to assist the President in keeping the deficit down in order to avoid taxes or raising the debt limit. If we are now going to go ahead, pell-mell, and appropriate above the Budget, then I submit to you that it is only legislatively honest to decide how you are going to pay the bill. Are you going to have a tax bill or are you going to raise the debt limit and borrow the money? You know as well as I know that the Congress has no idea of doing either one of those things at this session of the Congress. I do not know anything else to do but to do myself what you are doing—try to make your record and take your position and stand on it, but I feel this afternoon very much like the poet who said:

> I was at the funeral of all my hopes
> And tombed them one by one;
> Not a word was said, not a tear was shed,
> When the mournful task was done.

Ah, very much more important, my fellow Americans, than keeping that C. C. C. camp in my district and yours is to try to protect the economic foundations of this country and, today, they are in danger. [Applause.]

Mr. SCRUGHAM and Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire recognition?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to call attention to the fact that, insofar as pro forma amendments that may hereafter be offered are concerned, all debate on amendments to this paragraph has been closed by action of the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this is a preferential motion.

Mr. TARVER. I understand that. I am only referring to gentlemen offering further pro forma amendments.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] spoke most feelingly of the tragedy of adding $50,000,000 to this appropriation bill. In deepest sincerity, I call your attention to the much greater tragedy of throwing thousands, tens of thousands, and even hundreds of thousands of barely matured boys into a hopeless wandering of the streets through a denial to them of opportunity for wholesome employment. [Applause.]

If this Congress can approve of appropriations of $50,000,000 or even $100,000,000, for the purchase of instrumentalities of destruction and sudden death, they certainly should not oppose an appropriation of $50,000,000, for the benefit of underprivileged young men coming to maturity, and which will give them employment and an opportunity to become useful citizens. I have little or no sympathy with the idea of a spoon-fed young manhood, but likewise have no patience whatever with arguments about the tragedy of disturbing a subcommittee recommendation. The mighty economic strength of this Nation gives us the privilege of offering continuous opportunity of employment for our youth.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARCANTONIO) there were—ayes 94, noes 117.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am advised, no amendments will be offered to the language making provisions for the Office of Education, and if there should be, the request which I desire to submit will take care of the situation.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the language providing appropriations for the Office of Education, beginning in line 20, on page 19, and ending at the bottom of page 25, be inserted in the RECORD at this point and that the entire provisions be open for amendment on the part of anyone who may desire to offer amendments.

Mr. TABER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses, vocational rehabilitation: For carrying out the provisions of section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry, etc.," approved June 2, 1920 (29 U. S. C. 35), and the acts of June 5, 1924 (29 U. S. C. 31), June 9, 1930, and June 30, 1932 (29 U. S. C. 31, 40), August 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 620), and August 10, 1939 (53 Stat. 1381), and for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the operation of stands in Federal buildings by blind persons, to enlarge the economic opportunities of the blind, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1936 (49 Stat. 1559, 1560), $111,200 including not to exceed $2,000 for expenses of persons attending conferences called to meet in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $113,000.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. TARVER: Page 24, line 22, strike out "$111,200."

Mr. TARVER. That is an amendment to strike out surplusage in the language of the bill. It does not make any change.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Grants to States for aid to dependent children: For grants to States for the purpose of enabling each State to furnish financial assistance to needy dependent children, as authorized in title IV of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935, $75,000,000, of which sum such amount as may be necessary shall be available for grants under such title IV for any period in the fiscal year 1940 subsequent to March 31, 1940: Provided, That payments to States for the fourth quarter of the fiscal year 1940 and for any quarter in the fiscal year 1941 under such title IV may be made with respect to any State plan approved under such tite IV by the Social Security Board prior to or during such period, but no such payment shall be made with respect to any plan for any period prior to the quarter in which such plan was submitted to the Board for approval.

Grants to States for aid to the blind: For grants to States for the purpose of enabling each State to furnish financial assistance to needy individuals who are blind, as authorized in title X of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935, $10,000,000, of which sum such amount as may be necessary shall be available for grants under such title X for any period in the fiscal year 1940 subsequent to March 31, 1940: Provided, That payments to States for the fourth quarter of the fiscal year 1940 and for any quarter in the fiscal year 1941 under such title X may be made with respect to any State plan approved under such title X by the Social Security Board prior to or during such period, but no such payment shall be made with respect to any plan for any period prior to the quarter in which such plan was submitted to the Board for approval.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CASE of South Dakota: Page 38, line 20, after the figures "1935", insert the words "as amended."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, the committee accepts that amendment.

TO MAKE GRANTS FOR AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN ON 50–50 BASIS AS AUTHORIZED BY AMENDMENTS TO SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, my amendment simply inserts two words, "as amended," after the description of the Social Security Act. The purpose of this amendment, and of a like amendment which I shall offer to the next paragraph, is to make the appropriations for grants to States for aid to dependent children and to the blind available for matching on a 50-50 basis, as intended by the amendments to the Social Security Act, passed by this Congress last summer.

The amendment does not change the amount of the funds appropriated. They were calculated on the basis of doing what the amendment will permit. The language in the bill, however, is a carry-over of the old language in previous appropriation bills and would limit the funds to use—as authorized in title IV of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935.

The act of August 14, 1935, with respect to both of these funds, aid to dependent children (title IV) and aid to the blind (title X) limited the Federal grants-in-aid to one-third of the aid given each client. They differed in this respect from the aid for old-age assistance which were one-half Federal grants and one-half State.

Several States did not establish A. D. C. programs on that account. The legislature of my own State of South Dakota did not. The legislature of 1937, however, did provide for an A. D. C. program conditioned upon a change in the Federal law. The condition provided that the plan would not become operative until the Federal Government placed its grants-in-aid for these purposes on the same 50-50 basis as other grants-in-aid.

Thereupon, when the legislature adjourned, I introduced a bill in the Seventy-fifth Congress, H. R. 6041, March 31, 1937, to amend the Federal Social Security Act in that respect. It received considerable favorable comment. The principle was endorsed by numerous authorities. I again introduced the bill on the opening day of this Congress, January 3, 1939, as H. R. 954.

The item was one of the recommendations of the Social Security Advisory Council. The matter came before the Ways and Means Committee in their consideration of amendments to the act, during the first session of this Congress, a year ago, and the language of the bill was incorporated as one of the paragraphs in the committee bill which this Congress adopted last summer, amending generally the act of August 14, 1935.

Accordingly, I am sure that the committee presenting this appropriation bill carried out the intent of the Congress when it reported an appropriation bill based on estimates for 50-50 grants in harmony with the amended law. To make them effective, however, they must not be disbursed as authorized by the original act, but as authorized by the act as amended. My amendment in this paragraph, and in the succeeding paragraph, then, simply inserts the words "as amended" after the words "act of August 14, 1935," and insures that the intent of Congress will be followed in the making of the grants in aid. I appreciate the courtesy of the chairman and the subcommittee in accepting the amendment, and have simply made this statement so that the RECORD will show its intent and purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Also the following amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CASE of South Dakota: Page 39, line 10, after the figure "1935", insert the words "as amended."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, the committee accepts the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

PAR. 1. Part-time youth work and student aid: To enable the National Youth Administration, which is hereby extended to and including June 30, 1941, under the supervision and direction of the Federal Security Agency, to engage in the following types of programs for assistance to needy young persons, $79,635,000, namely:

(a) To provide part-time employment for needy young persons in schools, colleges, and universities to enable such persons to continue their education.

(b) To provide employment and training for unemployed young persons on public projects of the following types:

(I) The construction, improvement, and repair of non-Federal public buildings and grounds, parks, and other recreational facilities; bridges, highways, roads, streets, and alleys; airports and airway facilities; water and sanitation facilities; facilities for conservation; irrigation and flood control; pest eradication; and work on all other non-Federal public facilities including cooperative associations receiving financial assistance from the Rural Electrification Administration or other public agencies;

(II) The construction, improvement, and repair of buildings or other facilities of Federal agencies;

(III) The production, repair, and renovation of goods, articles, and foodstuffs for needy individuals and for public institutions providing that products so produced do not replace normal purchases of such individuals or institutions;

(IV) Professional, clerical, and other nonconstruction services in the fields of education, recreation, research, professional, cultural, and clerical activities for the benefit of public and nonprofit organizations;

(V) The prosecution of work of the types enumerated above which involve the maintenance of young persons in camps, institutions, and other resident facilities.

Mr. COLLINS and Mr. TABER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS: Page 41, line 4, strike out "$79,635,000" and insert "$94,635,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I may see if we can reach an agreement on time?

Mr. COLLINS. Certainly.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on amendments to this paragraph be limited to 1 hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. It seems to me that gentlemen who want to be heard on this are entitled to be heard for at least 5 minutes each.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, we have had a great deal of discussion of this matter under general debate. There was a great deal of discussion yesterday in connection with the adoption of the rule. I do not desire to be unreasonable in my request, but the limit of 1 hour was suggested by an ardent supporter of the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. I hope we will be able to agree to that limitation. If not, then I do not feel that I can afford to let the matter go on further than an hour, and in due time shall move to close debate at the end of that hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object. Of course, that limitation will take effect after I have made my speech.

Mr. TARVER. It was not so intended, but I shall ask that it be effective after the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi, the sponsor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. How many will be recognized and how much time will each have if this request is granted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has counted 18 gentlemen standing.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I don't know what the attitude of the others is, but I am opposed to the amendment, and I have an amendment which would reduce the amount. I feel that at least 5 minutes should be given to those who are opposed to the proposition and that if the chairman of the subcommittee desires to speak he should at least have that much.

Mr. TARVER. I ask the Chairman to reserve for the committee out of the hour 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered would give the National Youth Administration $100,000,000, approximately the sum of money that was appropriated to it for the fiscal year 1940. The bill as reported by the Appropriations Committee gives this agency the Budget estimate of $85,000,000, or about $15,000,000 less than the appropriation for 1940. The amendment I propose will, if adopted, raise the amount from $85,000,000 to $100,000,000.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I am not reflecting upon the subcommittee or any member of it. I have only praise for the position taken by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The policy of aiding needy citizens is likewise in line with governmental policy. Throughout our history the Government has made grants and subsidies to business to enable them to successfully carry on their work of building the country. Likewise the Government has aided needy citizens by donations in land and money. From 1863 down to 1890 the Federal Government gave each individual who wanted land up to 160 acres.

The combined area of land given to needy individuals over 21 years from 1863 down to 1890 amounted to the total area of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and half of Kentucky, combined. The persons given this land used it for their own personal needs. In the instant case the N. Y. A. students labor so they can continue in school or to gain a vocation. Their average wage is about $11 a month, and the fruits of their labor is given to society. They build roads, schools, and other types of public improvements for the common benefit of all. Certainly it is not contrary to our American policy to aid young people to secure an education. This is all we are doing and all we propose to do.

I maintain that if the proposal of the Appropriations Committee, of which I am a member, is adopted, 125,000 young men now in schools or learning trades will be thrown out of school or relieved of the small wage they now earn while taught a trade. There are approximately 750,000 of them receiving N. Y. A. aid. If we fail to raise the appropriation from $85,000,000 to $100,000,000, 125,000 of these young men and women will be denied an education or a vocation. I favor economy in government, but I refuse to economize by denying to the youth of the country the right to become educated citizens.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Much has been said about the Budget recommendation. Did not the Budget a year ago recommend $123,000,000 for this very work?

Mr. COLLINS. Absolutely; and in adopting $100,000,000 we are following the Congress of the United States and not some single individual in the Budget Bureau whose judgment cannot be any better than that of a Member of this House. Congress has already established a policy on this subject. That policy was made at the last Congress. The amount agreed upon was $100,000,000. It should not be reduced.

In this struggle for existence among nations it is evident that only those with high intellectual standards can survive. It is therefore the highest patriotism to build up the intellectual levels of our people. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma to the amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS: Strike out the figure "$94,635,000" and insert "$97,085,000".

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment offered by me is to give the National Youth Administration exactly the same amount it actually had during the present fiscal year. If the Collins amendment is adopted we will actually reduce all of the available funds for the N. Y. A. exactly $2,450,000 below the amount expended during the present year.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. There is included in this bill exactly $85,000,000. You had $100,000,000. The Collins amendment proposes to add $15,000,000. How does the gentleman reach his conclusion?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct, but I will say to the distinguished chairman of this subcommittee, that Mr. COLLINS, in offering his amendment, overlooked the fact that the Treasury of the United States was allowed $2,000,000 for servicing the N. Y. A. That $2,000,000 must be added if we desire that the N. Y. A. have the same appropriation during the next fiscal year.

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Did not the N. Y. A. also this year have the use of $450,000 in unexpended balances?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct, and that $450,000 added to the $2,000,000 makes up the exact amount that I propose to raise the Collins amendment.

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Then your amendment is $2,450,000 in excess of the Collins amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct, and that will give the N. Y. A. exactly the same amount that was expended on the N. Y. A. last year to maintain it.

Now, those figures are correct. I have them from the National Youth Administration and from the Treasury, and if there is any question about the figures I present I invite questions from any Member at this time. This body a few moments ago, by its vote, refused to slash the amount for the C. C. C. camps. We have just said by our vote that we want to retain all of the 1,500 camps; that we will refuse to turn the 54,000 boys now in the camp back on the streets and alleys. Unless my amendment or the Collins amendment is adopted we will say to 123,000 young men and women now on the N. Y. A. rolls, the fact that they will lose their jobs is no concern of ours. I am sure none of us wants to do that.

It was pointed out a moment ago that last year the Budget recommended $125,000,000. The Congress did not choose to follow the Budget last year and appropriated $100,000,000. Now, it seems passing strange that this all-wise, infallible Budget at this time should decide that the N. Y. A. must be cut $15,000,000. It is the responsibility of this Congress to make the appropriation. So if we really believe in the National Youth Administration, in its fine, patriotic program for youth, and desire to maintain it, on the same basis that we have for the past year, then I submit that my amendment should be adopted.

It occurs to me that the only question involved is whether or not the National Youth Administration actually needs the amount it now has in order to operate efficiently. I have heretofore pointed out that a large committee of businessmen representing various business activities, and coming from widely separated sections of the country, met in the city of Washington last December and gave a very careful study and investigation of the N. Y. A. as well as the problems of the American youth. This committee of conservative businessmen in its report not only places its stamp of approval upon this great organization, but calls on Congress to appropriate at least $200,000,000 to carry on this great youth program for another year. Yet the amendment I have proposed only permits the N. Y. A. to carry on on the same basis and with the same amount of funds as is being actually expended by this organization during this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON]. If it does not carry, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the equally distinguished gentleman from the State of Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. No one can cover this problem in 3 minutes.

I again want to call to your attention the fact that we have 4,000,000 unemployed workers in the United States today below the age of 25 years. Those unemployed youth represent more than one-third of the unemployed, although the youth constitute only one-fourth of all laborers in the market.

Mr. Chairman, I heard this afternoon a great speech made by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]. The gentleman is singularly gifted. However, I wish he would employ his great talents along lines more liberal to the needy and unfortunate. We must not lose sight of humanity in our desire to economize. We must not forget youth. The unhappy, dissatisfied, discontented, and idle youth is easy prey to those preaching short, unsound, and revolutionary ways to places in life and society.

I hope that Congress will come to the conclusion before it is too late that we must find work for the unemployed and the youth so that this country will not go the European way. This is Congress' No. 1 job. I am one of a committee of about 60 Congressmen trying to find a solution. Up to date no one has found the answer. We must not quit, however, in dispair.

I want to call your attention to another element that enters into this situation. Every single year more than 1,250,000 new workers enter the labor market, practically all of whom are young people leaving school. Because of death, retirements, disabilities, and voluntary withdrawals from the labor market only about 600,000 of these new workers become additions to the working forces of the country. This means that unless more than half a million new jobs are created each year, the number of unemployed will increase. We must not only preserve the present status of the N. Y. A., but we better go further and make provision for the additional workers thrown onto the labor market every year that the labor market cannot absorb. In my own State, Montana, 4,660 of these youths come from needy families and are engaged in the most constructive sort of work.

They work on a wide variety of projects, such as highways, roads, streets, improvement of grounds around public buildings, educational buildings, social and recreational buildings, airport buildings and facilities, recreational facilities other than buildings, conservation, irrigation and flood control, clerical assistance and service projects, library service and book repair, arts and crafts, music, drama and writing, recreational leadership, workshops, sewing, resident projects, nursery schools, and some other unclassified projects.

The type of work performed on the student-work program also covers a wide range of projects including research work and services, community-service work, ground and building maintenance, departmental service, library service, clerical work, and construction. The individual institutions supervise the work for the National Youth Administration, and all costs other than the wages paid to the youth are borne by the schools. Currently, there are 196 institutions in Montana that are assisting the National Youth Administration in providing part-time work for needy youth on the student-work program. Of these, 185 are high schools and 11 are colleges and universities.

The students that are employed on the N. Y. A. student-work program are selected by the institutions on the basis of need and scholarship. Last year, the average family income of all students in the United States whose applications were approved for N. Y. A. work was $557, with 44 percent of the families having incomes of less than $550 a year. Studies have shown that more than half of the young people who leave school do so because of lack of funds to continue their education. The National Youth Administration, with the cooperation of local educational institutions, has provided part-time work for many of these youth. The earnings on this program are sufficient to keep them in school, reducing the number who would otherwise be out of school and seeking work.

Our N. Y. A. set-up in Montana is a perfect organization headed by our very capable James Love. He and his subordinates are doing excellent work and, indeed, it will be regretted if he should be curtailed by lack of funds in the great work he and his organization are doing.

I sincerely hope the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma will be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] for 5 minutes.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, more than 744,000 young men and women will be helped by this appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, every time the Government invests $1 in a young man or young woman the investment is good for 40 years on an average. It is an investment in good citizenship. I do not know of a better way for the Government to spend money, and may I invite your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that we have a large sum of money in the Treasury of the United States that is not being used. I think it should be put into circulation. If we were to reduce our general fund in the Treasury to its normal level from the present balance of $2,729,483,901.91 as of March 25, 1940, we could use much more than $1,000,000,000 that is now in the general fund. Why have that money there idle, hoarded, absolutely not used, when there are 4,000,000 young men and young women under 25 who are out of jobs? We might just as well make up our minds that if we do not distribute privileges and opportunities and give people an opportunity to work that there will be a serious demand made in this country to distribute the wealth of the country. In addition to the money that I have mentioned, there is more than $1,800,000,000 in the stabilization fund that is not being used.

Are you going to vote to reduce appropriations like this and still have $3,000,000,000 in money in the United States Treasury that is not used at all? In 1937, as the gentleman from California pointed out a while ago appropriations for relief were cut, and we went into a recession; in fact, this country went into a tailspin, and that was one of the reasons. I have only a short time and cannot talk long, but I have a map here that shows the amount of money that is spent in each State for the education of the young people. You will notice in a number of States that a very small amount has been spent—an amount entirely too small. The map will be placed in the Speaker's lobby, and I hope you will examine it.

This money is used not only for pupils in high schools but for students in colleges and for out-of-school work to the extent of an average of $9 per month per pupil. Seven hundred and fifty thousand young men and women are being made better citizens at $9 a month. If I had my way and thought the House would support it, I would offer an amendment to double this appropriation and put 1,500,000 young men and young women on N. Y. A., give them a chance, an opportunity that they should have. I hope the Johnson amendment is adopted. If it is not adopted, I am for the Collins amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt about my vote for increasing appropriations for the C. C. C. camps.

I am going to vote for the pending amendment, but I have serious doubt as to whether we are moving in the right direction with the National Youth Administration program. I hope it can be strengthened. I have said many times to high-school classes: "Do not worry about the boy who is sent to college loaded with money by kind parents or an indulgent uncle for that boy undoubtedly will find employment in after years with the boy who is now working his way through school."

I am just wondering whether we are doing right in passing out these allowances to these young people in college. It is all right when the work is useful and carefully planned. The C. C. C. camps are different. That is a job which really makes rigid work requirements, and the most of the money goes back to parents who would otherwise be on relief.

I was the author of the soldier's education bill in Oregon that gave a total of $800, or $25 a month, to returning soldiers to enable them to secure higher education after the war. Under that bill a total of $4,000,000 was spent. I have often wondered whether we chose the best way to help the boys.

Perhaps the approach to the youth program is wrong. We must give the opportunity to work, we ought to give opportunity to do something, but when we pass out a sum every month, so much every year to the boys or the girls, possibly we are undermining character and ambition to do things for themselves. Are we making them dependent on subsidies?

When the president of Johns Hopkins left home as a boy of 21, he had very few dollars in his pocket. When he reached middle age he was president of one of the greatest institutions of research and learning in the country. Look back into your own careers and experiences. Where are the boys who went to school backed up by a lot of money? Where are the boys who went to school with but little? Most of the latter have made their mark.

I am doubting whether we are approaching the problem in the right way, making them all dependent on Government jobs and "made work." I do believe we have got to have some drastic legislation for youth and opportunity, but is this the line it should take? This is what is troubling me. I have hoped for development of a vocational program. I am going to vote for the amendment increasing the amount but doubting, yes, doubting, whether we are approaching the problem of aid to youth properly and correctly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. O'DAY].

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Chairman, there is not anyone here today, I venture to say, who does not very frequently talk with young men and women who are looking for work, who are well qualified to do work, and cannot find work. Probably most of these young people we talk with are more fortunate in their educations and their family circumstances than the great majority of those now employed on work projects of the National Youth Administration. The 325,000 young men and women between 18 and 25 years of age who work part time on N. Y. A. projects have not had the chance to stay in school. Two-fifths of them never went beyond grammar school. Only a fourth have high-school diplomas. And over a half of them have never known what it means to have a job. We can all realize what they face when they look for work—and I am sure we all believe in the young people of America enough to know that they do look for work. What are the first questions asked applicants for jobs? "What is your training?" "Where have you worked before?"

The N. Y. A. program for out-of-school and unemployed young people fills these two important needs of job-seekers—it gives them sound work experience and it provides them with related training which helps them to meet the requirements for jobs. Young people certified for N. Y. A. work are paid an average of $15.58 a month for approximately one-third time work. On their own time and without pay they resume studies which N. Y. A. arranges wherever possible with existing educational institutions. And every N. Y. A. worker is registered in a public employment agency.

We will all agree, I feel sure, that our young people have a right to be busy working and learning. But what is the result? Here are the figures. Youth do not stay on N. Y. A. longer than is absolutely necessary. There is a 90- to 100-percent yearly turn-over. Thirty-one percent of the youth leaving N. Y. A. reported that they received private employment. Twenty-three percent leave because of loss of eligibility—that is they reach the age limit, or their families lift themselves up so that their young people no longer are in dire need. Five and three-tenths percent go back to school. Four and three-tenths percent are discharged from projects. The great majority of the rest who leave, undoubtedly get private jobs, too. After work experience on N. Y. A., these young people can enter an employment office and say, "Yes, I have worked. I have had a job. I know how to do the work you want." It is impossible to measure the value of that only in dollars and cents.

Besides this splendid work program for out-of-school and out-of-work young Americans, N. Y. A. provides part-time employment for needy students, 16 to 25 years old, in high schools and colleges. These are not the unemployed young people—but the very great majority of them would be on the labor market if they did not have this chance to earn enough to stay in school. They, too, perform useful work either for the schools which they attend or for the communities in which they live. Those in high school earn on an average $4.50 a month for the school year, and those in college earn a monthly average of $12.94. All N. Y. A. student workers are selected by the institutions which they attend on the basis of need and ability. This program has widened democracy in education. And young people today want to see democracy in action as well as hear about it in speech. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] that I have no such fears as he entertains. He evidently is under the impression that the N. Y. A. is passing out a dole of $10 or $15 a month to students in order to induce them to go to school. I have been a school teacher for many years. I have worked with these people ever since the N. Y. A. was established, and I have seen its effect upon several thousand college students as well as upon a large number of high-school students.

Those young people come to the campus at registration time, they have come to my office, and they have begged for an opportunity to do some work in order to go to college. If they can get $15 to help pay their expenses, that is often sufficient, but it is not presented to them on a silver platter. Those who are typists type many hours each month for their pay. Those young men who are without stenographic or typing skill ask for an opportunity to work on the grounds at manual labor. I have seen young women, graduates of high schools with honor and high resolve, come to my college and ask for a menial job, because that was the only thing left for them. They would even dust the furniture and mop the floors and the steps of the academic buildings as well as doing housekeeping duties in dormitories. I have seen all this and more, and I want to say to the gentleman from Oregon that I take off my hat out of respect for such courageous striving. Because of this respect I have employed some of these young persons in my office here in Washington, the most competent young persons to be found in the State of Arizona. Those young folk I know positively come from homes which could not afford to send them to college if they had not worked their way through.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman know of any N. Y. A. students who are now receiving or who have ever received a dole at the hands of the Government?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. No; I do not. It was not a dole they received but a job of hard but useful work.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. What has the gentleman found in his State to be the opinion of the heads of schools of his State regarding the N. Y. A. and its effect on the young people in those schools?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. They are universally in favor of it. I have telegrams from many schoolmen to that effect.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. May I say that the same thing obtains exactly in my district and in my State. They are enthusiastically in favor of this program.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I believe it was the old Roman Quintilian, or possibly Cicero, whose parents moved from the farm to the city for his education—brought him into Rome to study so that he might become a great man. Parents have ever been like that. I know many parents, similar to those in the story of Enoch Arden, who want their children to have a little better education than they have received. I know fathers and mothers who say, "I want my girl or my boy to have an education." Parents want this work to continue.

Year after year we have very much the same fight to make concerning the appropriation for the National Youth Administration. We not only have to fight hard to get an amendment through increasing the Budget estimate for N. Y. A., but we likewise have to fight to keep those who are unfriendly to this agency from reducing the amount even below the committee figure. We recall that about the middle of June last year when this particular appropriation was then before the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] moved to reduce the amount so drastically that had his amendment been adopted on June 16, 1939, we would not have today an N. Y. A. worth debating about. Quite probably a similar attempt will be made in this case so that those who value the N. Y. A. must fight valiantly in two respects—to increase the amount sufficiently and to block any proposed decrease successfully. Naturally, I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] and I should like to see his amendment amended by the proposal of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] and shall vote accordingly. If these amendments should fail, I have an amendment of my own to offer.

I was much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] when he on introducing his amendment explained that he was but attempting to carry out the long-established policy of the American Government. As I followed his reasoning it was that formerly the Government gave, or virtually gave, its adventurous citizens 160 acres of free land on which to make a living, but that now he proposed that the Government should furnish young citizens with a little different kind of start in life—help to secure an essential education. I know the gentleman from Mississippi is a friend of youth and of the cause of education, and it strikes me that his patriotic idea represents sound statesmanship.

Ours has been a land of opportunity for several generations past. Our energetic and adventurous citizens, our fathers, and grandfathers could easily acquire 160 acres of virgin and fruitful land out on the frontier which was the beginning of an estate for himself and for his family. That day is past. The geographical frontiers have vanished. However, there are new frontiers in which our young citizens may do pioneering. These are frontiers of science and knowledge and business, and one cannot do this pioneering without a more extensive preparation than our generation or any former generation in America have had. Surely it is just as good Americanism and statesmanship for this Nation to provide nearly free the minimum of educational advantage to as large a number as possible as it was in times past for this Government to furnish nearly free a homestead on public lands to as large a number of citizens as possible. I urge a full support of the Johnson amendment to the Collins amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr.

JOHNSON], and in the event that amendment fails I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS.] With 4,700,000 young men and women in this country without jobs and without the opportunity of securing an education we are just playing and shadow-boxing with the youth problem in jacking up this appropriation from $85,000,000 to only $100,000,000. It is most unfortunate that the Budget recommendation did not carry the sum that the agency had last year, and it is also most unfortunate that the committee did not assume the responsibility to raise the amount. However, even a $100,000,000 appropriation is not going to do the job. The only proposal that will meet the problem is the American Youth Act. Since this bill cannot be considered at this time I strongly urge the increase for the National Youth Administration.

I want to call the attention of the members of this Committee to the basic theory upon which these cuts are being advocated nowadays. They are being advocated in the hope that the so-called war boom will absorb our unemployed and in the hope that people will be put to work as the result of war purchases abroad. May I read, in answer to that expectation, a paragraph contained in a pamphlet, Program of Action for American Youth, which was issued in October 1939 by the American Youth Commission, on which there are such men as Robert E. Wood, chairman of the board of Sears, Roebuck & Co., and Owen D. Young, chairman of the board of General Electric Co.

The American Youth Commission has this to say:

> While it seems probable that business will be stimulated by war purchases, the most optimistic estimates indicate only two or three million new jobs for the many millions of unemployed workers. The Commission believes that the remaining unemployment will be concentrated heavily in the lower-age groups. The continued pressure of unemployment on youth, in the midst of a war boom, will add to the danger of drifting into active participation in the war.

Hence, unless we provide jobs and education for American youth, we must take the responsibility for forcing them into war as a result of legislation which is based on a war economy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE].

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to rise here in support of the substitute amendment offered by my colleague the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON]. In the event of the failure of his amendment, I intend to support the Collins amendment. I am impelled to do this because of my intimate knowledge of the workings of the national youth program in my part of the country.

Heretofore on the floor of this House I have repeatedly expressed myself to the effect that we had better begin to pay more attention to our internal or domestic affairs. We cannot lightly turn aside and disregard the youth of this Nation. Two or three years ago I saw an estimate that there were more than 5,000,000 young men and young women, graduates of colleges and universities in the United States, who had never had a job in their lives since their graduation from these institutions. I do not know whether or not this condition has improved, but I do know that we are graduating every June from the high schools, colleges, and universities of this country approximately 1,000,000 young men and women, and they cannot get work. We cannot ignore this condition.

I love my friend the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE], who has just made the statement that when he got up here to consider this bill he did so and was going to vote for it with his fingers crossed, but I may say to the gentleman that I have had my fingers crossed since long before this bill was ever brought to the floor of this House, and I rather believe he has, too. Every other Member of this House must have had his fingers crossed if he has much mentality about him.

My understanding is that there are approximately 750,000 young men and women who are now receiving the benefits of the National Youth Administration program. If the bill recommended by the subcommittee providing $79,635,000 carries, 125,000 of the 750,000 that are now receiving the benefits of the program will have to be left out of consideration. We must not forget the fact that about a million boys and girls take on their full-fledged citizenship every year, and it is well that we should cross our fingers for it is a great problem in sociology that we are facing.

I do not know of anything that would be more tragic in this period of depression when the most worthy and the fittest of our young men and women are unable to find employment of any kind than to refuse to appropriate adequate funds for carrying on the National Youth Administration program. It is well enough to talk about economy, and it would be a fine thing to practice, but I believe it is real economy to look after this growing army of a million young men and women each year and let some of the other things go by until conditions change. Of course, all of us unhesitatingly vote for huge appropriations for the Navy and air force and the Army of the country. I have done this consistently because that is in the interest of the self-defense of the Nation. This program of the National Youth Administration is equally in the interest of our own self-defense, if not more so, than any of the other appropriations we have made. If we have to cut somewhere to economize, we should not begin on a program of this sort because it is a human program and the consequences of abolishing this program are too serious for Congress to hesitate to do its duty about it.

Specifically, I shall give you the following in regard to the operation of the National Youth Administration in my own State of Oklahoma: The National Youth Administration is employing a total of 22,578 boys and girls. Of this number, 13,722 are earning sufficient money to continue their education either in the secondary schools or in the colleges and universities. It is estimated that in addition to the 22,578 who benefit by the program, there is a total of 60,826 needy youths in the State who are yet unable to be assigned and receive the benefits of this program. Of this 60,826 needy unassigned youths, a very large percent of them would now be furthering their education in the educational institutions of the State if sufficient funds were made available. The amount of money spent on each youth in Oklahoma ranges from $3 to $20 per month, and the average is about $15. This is a meager sum for the Government to spend rather than take chances on what may happen without a National Youth Administration program in operation. It should never be lost sight of that this program is not merely a play program; for these boys and girls that earn this money and attend these schools show their interest in education and preparation for the duties awaiting them by doing all kinds of menial services.

The boys and girls we are helping through the schools and colleges and who are training themselves for some calling in life are merely the victims of a bad economic condition which we are responsible for in this country. We have made it so that very few persons who live on farms can get money enough out of their entire production to send even one child to a higher institution of learning. This National Youth Administration program will make up for the delinquency to a very large extent. I know of no safer way to fix the character of the future citizenship of this country than to do this kind of work, which the boys and girls of America appreciate. They do not want to be regarded in the light of receiving a dole or as being dependent on anybody. We had just as well acknowledge the corn and make the frank admission that had it not been for the failure of this and other legislative bodies in America to properly provide against such catastrophic economic conditions, the probabilities are that there would not be such a vast army of unemployed, and that the laboring man and the farmer would be in that economic condition that would enable him to do for those boys and girls what this bill undertakes to do for them.

While the ship of war is an instrumentality without which we cannot afford to do in the necessary defense of this Government of ours, I believe the people of the country would applaud very loudly the effort of Congress to see to it that there are other things that should be equally engaging to

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Members of Congress as building warships, airplanes, and large armies. I think these precautionary measures should all be taken along together.

We can drop the National Youth Administration program if we better the economic conditions. We can better the economic conditions, but we have not done so. No boy or girl in my section of the country can find any such thing as industrial employment. They must either go to the farm or do without employment, and no farmer under present price conditions can afford to hire one of these boys or girls. The defeat of this appropriation for the National Youth Administration would be a serious blow to the future welfare of this country. We can ill afford to take the chance. If we will stay with the boys and girls of America, we know they are going to stand behind America under any and all conditions, for it is up to them in a few years to furnish all the man-power and the spiritual power without which we cannot expect to go forward.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago the House expressed itself as favorable to the continuance of the C. C. C. program next year as it is the present fiscal year. I sincerely hope the Congress will not make an unjustified distinction between the C. C. C. program and the N. Y. A. program. There is, of course, this distinction: The C. C. C. program costs $1,000 per youth while the N. Y. A. program costs about $135 per annum per youth. Boys and girls are both drawn into the N. Y. A. program. The boys in the C. C. C. program and those in the N. Y. A. program are drawn from the same families, and have the same need.

It seems to me, in response to the criticism of the distinguished gentleman from Oregon, that we are free to support the N. Y. A. program, particularly because it is so far away from the question of the dole. These young men and young ladies are working for an average of only $6.85 a month; they are actually earning every penny of it. I believe my greatest disappointment as a Member of this Congress is that we have made no really constructive headway toward solving the problem of unemployment that faces this Nation. Until some progress is made in the solution of that problem, I believe this N. Y. A. program should be continued as a worth-while investment in the youth of this Nation. I hope the substitute offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma will be adopted.

There are about 4,000,000 unemployed workers below 25 years of age in the United States today. These unemployed youth represent more than a third of the unemployed, although youth constitute only a fourth of all workers in the labor market. Thus, the problem of unemployment is more severe among younger workers than any other age group. Also, since unemployment concentrates among low-income families, most of the unemployed youth come from families whose incomes are insufficient to provide them with minimum needs. In this connection, it should be remembered that one-third of American families receive total incomes of less than $780 a year. Most of the unemployed youth come from this portion of the population.

There are three major programs of the Federal Government that provide assistance for unemployed workers below 25 years of age.

Current employment

N. Y. A. out-of-school work program	312,000
Civilian Conservation Corps	250,000
Work Projects Administration	278,000
Total	840,000

In addition the National Youth Administration provides part-time work for 434,000 students in the schools, colleges, and universities. By providing this part-time work, the National Youth Administration enables the students to remain in school and keeps them out of the labor market, where they would increase the competition for jobs or swell the number of unemployed workers.

The Federal Government, in providing employment for 840,000 unemployed youth, is assisting only 21 percent of the total number of unemployed youth. There remains over 3,000,000 unemployed youth who are not being helped by these employment programs.

As a further indication of the unmet need of the unemployed, there are 340,000 youth certified to the National Youth Administration as in need of employment on the out-of-school work program beyond the 312,000 now employed on that program. In addition, the N. Y. A. State administrators report that there are 2,119,000 youth who are not yet certified to the National Youth Administration, but who are unemployed and are members of families whose income is insufficient to provide the basic needs of a family. Thus, there is a total of nearly 2,500,000 unemployed youth not receiving employment from Federal programs who are desperately in need of work.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON]. If that is defeated, of course I shall then support the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. I view the appropriation which we are making and which we have been making for the N. Y. A. as a great investment in American citizenship. Surely no one can make a greater investment. The greatest dividends that we can receive will come from our investments in the youth. When the historian of the future comes to review the work of this period in our American civilization, I believe he will place near the top of the list the investment which the American Nation has made and is making in our youth. This investment will be paying dividends 40 and 50 years from today. Yea; the principal will be passed on to children yet unborn.

PRESERVING DEMOCRACY

We hear a great deal said these days about preserving democracy in America. I submit that this investment which we are making in our youth will go far to make this country safe for democracy. A nation owes a chance to its citizens. If we are to hold up before the youth of our land the great advantages in a democracy, we should strive to make those advantages real by giving them a chance. If this appropriation is cut, as has been proposed by this bill, it will mean that more than 100,000 of our deserving young men and young women will be turned out without an opportunity to go to school. It is tragic to contemplate.

STAND BY THE YOUTH

Mr. Chairman, all of my life I have persistently and consistently battled to give our young people a chance. As a boy on the farm, who had to go to school long distances and under very adverse circumstances, I knew what poor boys had to confront. Later, in the Louisiana State University, I knew what it meant to wash dishes, wait on tables, patrol the campus at night and do everything honorable to stay in school. I say without shame that I knew what it was to live on two meals a day and to go without other necessities in school. It is an inspiration to me now and an opportunity, the memory of which I shall cherish to my dying day, to stand in the Well of this House and plead for a chance for boys and girls situated like I was. Everyone who is left out if this appropriation is reduced will in all probability not be able to go to school at all. Do we want this democratic Nation, this richest nation in the world, to turn these deserving boys and girls away from our high schools and colleges? I do not believe the American people want that done.

The sum proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] is the very least which this Congress ought to consider. This sum will give us, as I understand it, about the same that we had last year. We really ought to have more. We ought to make it possible to take care of more youths, but, by all means, let us not reduce the amount. I sincerely hope that this Congress will not take this backward step.

N. Y. A. IN EIGHTH DISTRICT

I have received some information concerning the N. Y. A. work in the Eighth Congressional District of Louisiana, which I have the honor to represent. To me it is very interesting and enlightening and I will give it briefly. From January 1, 1937, to June 30, 1940, the N. Y. A. erected in the Eighth District no less than 16 buildings for various purposes. From January 1, 1937, to June 30, 1937, a total of 433 young people were assisted through the N. Y. A. From July 1, 1937, to June 30, 1938, a total of 460 were assisted. From July 1, 1938, to June 30, 1939, a total of 978 were assisted, and from July 1, 1939, to June 30, 1940, a total of 1,008 will be assisted. The Government spent on these young people in the Eighth District from January 1, 1937, to June 30, 1940, a total of $640,543.62. Many of them were assisted in high schools.

The Eighth District of Louisiana, in the session of 1939–40, is represented in 18 colleges through N. Y. A. assistance. Eighty-three students from the district are receiving aid at Louisiana State University; 19 at Louisiana Polytechnic at Ruston; 101 at the State Normal at Natchitoches; and 25 at Louisiana College, Pineville. If this appropriation is reduced, in line with what this bill calls for, it will not only mean that there will be no additional students taken care of, but actually a smaller number can be assisted next year. My stand and my vote always have been, are today, and always will be in behalf of the youth. I shall, therefore, support these amendments to increase the appropriation for this very worthy cause, and thereby give more chance to deserving young people. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is a real investment in democracy.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Is not true that 123,000 of these young people will be laid off of this program unless this amendment carries?

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. I understand so. That would be a tragedy in America, Mr. Chairman. Let us not do that to these fine young people.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Is it not also true that a committee of businessmen, called here last December, passed a resolution stating that it would take a minimum of $200,000,000 to do the job as far as the N. Y. A. is concerned?

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. I believe that is correct.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, a year ago I spoke in favor of an amendment increasing the amount for the National Youth Administration from $85,000,000 to $100,000,000. Last Monday I spoke before the Members of this House and called attention to the program of the N. Y. A. and stated that I would vote to restore the amount to what it was last year. I understand the Johnson amendment will do this. If it will not, then I am for the Collins amendment. I am for anything that is going to help the youths of this country, because I think I know about as much about the problems of the youths as anybody can know, because, as I have said before, I worked my way through high school and college. The only difference here is that these boys and girls are getting about $4.15 a week for their work, and I got $1.50 for the work I did.

This is an investment, as the gentleman who just preceded me said. It is an asset to this Nation if we can teach these boys and girls in a republic what a democracy is, and the only way we can ever maintain this Nation is by educating youths in democracy. This is what Germany is doing with youths in nazi-ism today and what Russia is doing with youths in communism, and unless we can keep the minds of these boys and girls occupied during a restless period through which they must pass, they are going to spend their time listening to some soap-box orator out on the street corners some place, and they are not going to get the teachings they should have.

This is an investment of only about $15,000,000 more than what has been recommended by the committee. There is nobody in this House can say that I am not for economy. Last year I said this Government could be run with $8,000,000,000, and I voted for that amount, but Congress voted $13,000,000,000. The President has come almost to my conclusion, and he is asking for $8,400,000,000 this year. So he and I are just about agreed on the amount, but this is no place to economize. I voted against an amendment for $50,000,000 a few moments ago because I did not believe the amount should be increased that much. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL] is recognized.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, this is my fourth term as a Member of this House and the longer I stay here the more I am amazed at the smug complacency of Members of this House when we consider the tragedies all around us. The gentleman from Virginia spoke of the tragedy of not balancing the Budget. May I mention three tragedies that are right about us? Here are men and women in the sunset of life, in old age, and yet we cannot give them the decencies and comforts of life, but they must dread the future. Yet we will not consider that problem—that of old-age pensions. Tragedy No. 1. We must adjourn over week ends, and we are talking about adjourning June 1. Then we have unemployment with 10,000,000 asking for a job in America, the land of opportunity.

This country does not owe any man a living, but it owes every man a job to earn a living to feed his wife and his children. Yet we have not solved this problem. Tragedy No. 2. Here we have our youth problem. The greatest resource in America is our boys and girls, and in the C. C. C. and N. Y. A. we are trying to give them something worth while, in the morning of life as they come to us. We have not solved that problem. Tragedy No. 3. We have those in the sunset of life, those in the prime of life, and those who in the morning of life coming to ask us to help them. Yet we refuse to heed their appeal.

I say I am amazed at the smug complacency of the Members of this House who have a good salary, who have mileage, and I am informed that one of them who is so strong about balancing the Budget, has about $50,000 coming to relatives and himself annually. He also wanted to appropriate $350,000 besides the $250,000 allowed to send Mr. Byrd down to the Antarctic to find penguins and bring them back to America. But he cannot see his way clear to help the needy boys and girls of America to education, to opportunity, and to success. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER as a substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS: On page 41, line 4, after the first comma, strike out "$79,635,000" and insert "$39,000,000."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment designed to save a little money. Now, let me tell you what the situation is, so that you may know it. The estimates proposed by the N. Y. A. called for approximately $28,000,000 for the so-called school and college program for these students who are going to school and to college. This amendment would leave money enough to carry that on and would leave $11,000,000 to take care of tapering off the so-called work program. The work program as I have seen it—and I have seen quite a little of it—is totally demoralizing. It is not a constructive proposition. The part of it that relates to the students of schools and colleges is entirely out from under the thumb of Aubrey Williams. The other part is directly under him. If we are going to teach our boys and girls ways of self-reliance, independence, capacity, and individual initiative, we must get rid of that part of the activity that is under the thumb of Aubrey Williams. Just think of offering to increase an item of this kind at a time when the Federal Security Administration reported on Monday last the following:

State and local communities had 1 percent fewer relief cases in February than January, and cut their cost 3 percent, a survey by the Federal Security Administration reported yesterday. Reports from 109 urban districts in 39 States showed the biggest increase in Huntington, W. Va., and the biggest decrease in Charleston and Wheeling, W. Va.

We are at a place now where the cost of relief is going down. Why should we at this time provide funds for work projects in competition with W. P. A.? It is the most ridiculous and scandalous proposition that I ever heard of, to turn boys loose to demoralize them under the tutelage of Aubrey Williams. He has shown himself one of those who are not capable of teaching any young men Americanism, and I do not want to see those boys put in the position where they are demoralized. I hope that we can show a little sense in the line of economy and adopt this substitute that I have offered and save a dollar for the Treasury and save many boys from the influence of Aubrey Williams.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, two and a half minutes is not very long to discuss this thing, but statements have been made by Members this afternoon and by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], who just preceded me, that it is so necessary to preserve the economic structure of this Government, so necessary to save money.

I submit to you in all fairness that the economic structure of this Government is secondary compared to the human fiber of this country, and this Government is no stronger, nor will it ever be any stronger than the strength of the youths of the country. We would better have more concern with equipping our youths with education, training, and knowledge that will fit them to carry on the traditions of this Government, than be here quibbling about the difference between $100,000,000 and $33,000,000. Insofar as the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] being worried about whether or not these youths will be demoralized under the influence of Aubrey Williams, I am not ready to admit that Aubrey Williams is a Communist, but even if he were, I submit to you, is it of greater danger so far as demoralization is concerned for them to be under the influence of Aubrey Williams, than to be forced into the highways and the byways, the poolrooms, and unemployment? Which would demoralize them most?

If you want to take the youths of this country out of Communist organizations such as the National Youth Congress, a thing which I abhor, if you want to win them away from communism, give them education, give them opportunity to grow strong, to get the thing which youths are naturally entitled to, and then you will not find Communist organizations growing up all over the country with the young folks. [Applause.]

We talk about the coming generation, which will have to pay back the money that we have been spending. We must make certain that this coming generation is equipped by education and training to take its place upon the scene of human action and do its part to extend the frontiers of accomplishment of our people.

The part of the National Youth Administration in rounding out our educational system has brought unanimous approval from the educators of my State. Thousands of young folks have been enabled to complete their high-school education and hundreds have been enabled to obtain college degrees through the assistance they have thus received. In addition, a great number have obtained out-of-school training in shop work in various trades which will quickly fit them for taking their place in industrial pursuits.

With the course of world events, these young folks know that at any time they may be called upon to take up arms in defense of our country and its ideals. They are willing to do this, as long as our country gives them a fair chance. But if we do not give them this chance we may be faced with serious consequences.

Of course no one wants to waste money, or appropriate money that is not needed. I would be willing to agree to reduction in N. Y. A. appropriations if the need had passed or even been lessened, but I am acquainted with the situation intimately in my country, and know that the need is as great as ever for this form of assistance.

I am hopeful that my colleagues will give sympathetic consideration to our needs.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] which would reduce the N. Y. A. appropriation by about $40,645,000. I would not undertake, even if I were so inclined, to refute the arguments made here this afternoon in support of the increased appropriation for the National Youth Administration, for I do not think there is any disagreement as to the very efficient work that has been done by the N. Y. A., but I would like to say the National Youth Administration so far is purely a relief activity and, when viewed from a sound governmental standpoint, such an activity ought first to have a definite, clean, and clear-cut plan approved by this Congress before we go too far with our appropriations.

I see no justification for reducing the N. Y. A. appropriation as provided in the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and as long as Congress is unwilling to make the N. Y. A. a permanent policy of government and outline specifically the functions and duties of this activity, I do not see any particular reason why the appropriation recommended by the President and the Budget Bureau should be disturbed. However, when the functions and duties are specifically designated by Congress I am sure your committee will see to it that adequate appropriations are provided. I do not believe the people of the country expect Congress to go "hog wild" and make excessive appropriations without having some idea as to where and in what manner the money is to be used.

I would be unfair to myself, as well as to the N. Y. A., should I fail to take this opportunity to express my commendation for the assistance or aid furnished those young men and young women who have been unable to continue their high-school or college work, including those who have been able to continue their high-school and college work by reason of the assistance furnished, because I am quite sure there are many cases where the assistance rendered has determined the future life and career of a number of young men and women. You will pardon this personal allusion, but I can well remember that following my second year in college the ability to remain there was contingent upon raising 50 cents per week, or $25 per year. It is not necessary to explain the outcome in detail, but I desire to say for the record I have never been the beneficiary of a favor which has commanded a more sincere and more lasting gratitude than the favor of that friend who was willing to make a sacrifice and provide me with the $25 necessary to continue my college work. In this bill such students are not limited to $25 per year but may be furnished as much as $20 per month, and the program of the past few years can be continued without impairment on the appropriation provided for in this bill.

It is true the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] makes a strong argument for increasing the appropriation when he shows that for a generation or more following the Civil War our Government was very generous in making grants to young men by giving them a 160-acre farm each in order to get a start in life and thereby be able to contribute to the welfare of the Nation in future years. He argues that free land is no longer available and in lieu thereof it is entirely proper to make these contributions in order to assist the future citizenry of the Nation. However, the amendment offered to reduce the amount carried in this bill should not prevail, because this would practically destroy the existing program.

OLD-AGE PENSION

Mr. Chairman, as nothing has been said in this debate so far about a change in the ratio between the Federal contribution and the States' for old-age assistance, I would like to call attention to some of the testimony before the committee which suggests a more equitable arrangement than the 50–50 provision of the existing law.

Under the present law the Federal Government contributes dollar for dollar to the States up to $20 per month for every needy person over 65 years of age who can qualify under the State law. Under this arrangement the average monthly payment ranges from about $6 per month to $32 in the several States, and it is generally known there are many needy people over 65 years of age whose applications have not been approved in a number of States for the reason that such States have not been financially able to meet their part of the payments. There was testimony submitted to you committee to the effect that the present arrangement operates as an actual burden to a number of States where the per capita wealth is low. To illustrate: One State may contribute only $6 per month and another may contribute $20 per month, but the former will be contributing more in proportion to its per capita wealth than the latter. At the same time, the poor States contribute their share to the contribution made by the Federal Government, and in actual operation the wealthier States, while making a greater contribution to the needy old-age persons, are actually placing an additional burden on the poorer States to assist in the contribution made by the Federal Government to the wealthier States.

I think it is generally understood the present arrangement is not satisfactory, and an effort was made last year to change the uniform matching ratio from 50–50 to 75–25. That is, in the latter case the Federal Government would pay 75 cents to the States' 25 cents of each dollar paid in the way of old-age assistance. Of course, this would improve the situation, in the minds of many of us, because it would decrease the contribution made by the States directly, but at the same time it would force the States to increase their contribution to the Federal Government to meet its proportionate share.

It has been suggested by the Social Security Board there ought to be a system of variable grants to the States by the Federal Government instead of the flat matching, and that the variable grant should be related to the economic capacity and the need of the individual States. According to the testimony of Dr. Altmeyer, Chairman of the Board, such a plan should not be very difficult to administer for the reason that statistics of average income in the States are now being collected and published annually by the Department of Commerce, and he expressed the firm conviction that a formula could easily be worked out on such a basis, saying this plan would be more desirable than the existing one. On page 809 of the hearings he says:

> We think there ought to be a system of variable grants instead of this flat matching, and that that variable grant should be related to the economic capacity and the need of the individual States.

On page 813 of the hearings he states:

> We think that this average per capita income is the best single criteria.

However, he testified with a great deal of emphasis as well as logic that it would be most unfortunate for the Federal Government to assume full responsibility and pay the full amount, saying that the States should be charged with the duty and responsibility of determining the eligibility of applicants and, at the same time, contribute to their needs in proportion to the per capita wealth. That is, the contributions by the States should be in proportion to their ability to pay. This will enable the poorer States to increase the number of beneficiaries, as well as the amount paid to each.

I am calling attention to the above problem at this time with the hope the matter may receive careful study and consideration in the next Congress.

CONCILIATION SERVICE

Mr. Chairman, there are a number of matters in this bill I would like to discuss, but time will not permit. However, there is one suggestion I want to submit relative to the Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor. There has been much legislation in recent years for the purpose of promoting conciliation of disputes in our industrial and transportation activities, and the Congress is still called upon to provide increased appropriations from year to year to enlarge the Service and provide conciliators to assist in the solution of open breaches between employers and employees. I am satisfied in the action of Congress and the cooperation of employers and employees to promote the economic life of each all have acted sincerely in an effort to properly interpret, analyze, and solve the problems of each, and there is no doubt but what distinct progress has been made, although it must be admitted the efforts have not been as fruitful as they might have been. The Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor is one of the most valuable activities of our Government and has contributed much toward the promotion and establishment of industrial peace, but it is greatly to be regretted we have not reached the point when open breaches are prevented or averted. As a matter of fact, the number and complexity of controversial issues seem to be multiplying in spite of the honest and determined efforts on the part of both elements to adjust and conciliate their differences.

Some will say it is an indictment against our civilization and a challenge to our educational system to find that when legislation is enacted for the social and economic betterment of all the people there must be increased annual appropriations to employ more and more men and women to act as inspectors and investigators to enforce the laws against an ever-increasing number of violators, indicating there must be something wrong with our intellectual or moral fiber when a majority of our citizenry incorporate an agreed policy into law for the benefit of all and then have to employ from year to year an increased number of people to compel obedience to such a policy.

Right or wrong, correct or incorrect, in these observations I am going to suggest that, if there are to be increased appropriations from time to time, a part of such increase should be used in promoting a program of education that will enable our industrial management to better understand the viewpoint and appreciate the equitable and legal rights of employees and to better evaluate labor's contribution to the value of the finished product. At the same time, such a program should not fail to include the millions of employees so that after years of study each and all will be able to recognize and understand not only their own rights and obligations but will be able to appreciate and recognize the functions and rights of others. Mr. Chairman, I can possibly better explain my thought by illustration:

Suppose A, an employer, and B, an employee, disagree as to their rights and duties under any of our laws and a strike or shut-out follows. A conciliator, C, is called in. They all discuss the problem and finally A and B agree and settle their dispute. The assumption is that C was able to give both A and B some information they did not have before, or else they could not have agreed, and the point I am trying to make is that if C was able to furnish information after the breach that convinced A or B that one or both were wrong, why could they not have had the same information in advance and avoided the breach which may have caused great loss or inconvenience to employer, employee, and the public in the meantime. That is, if they can agree after conferring with the conciliator following a breach it seems to me they might, with the same information, be able to agree beforehand and avoid such a breach.

It appears to me that if there could be some way to utilize the Conciliation Service to a greater extent in some organized or systematic educational way far enough in advance of a breach we might hope to reach a point some time in the future when we could reasonably expect to make a reduction in appropriations to be used for employing inspectors, investigators, and prosecutors. That is, if we could transfer some of the conciliators and place them in front of the breach instead of after it, I believe that within one generation open conflicts between labor and industry, such as strikes and shut-outs, would be a thing of the past. This appropriation could then be reduced to a minimum or abolished; hundreds of inspectors, referred to here today as "snooping detectives," would be eliminated; capital would emerge unafraid from its hiding places; new and added industries would spring up in every section of our country; labor would no longer be afraid of oppression or the empty dinner pail; starving children would cease to clamor at the withered breast of hungry mothers; and this country would again bloom and blossom as the rose, because there would be an honest and intelligent understanding and cooperation between the two great productive agencies of this Nation—labor and industry.

Mr. Chairman, I submit this suggestion for whatever it may be worth, for I cannot believe but what the great majority of the people of this country want to be fair and honest and will demonstrate these virtues when mutual opportunities are afforded. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, of course I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. I am surprised that he did not make a motion to strike out the entire appropriation.

These young people are not going to school to Aubrey Williams. They are going to the various schools throughout the country that are operated by the authorities of the various States.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the rest of the Old Guard on his side amuse me. They rise in holy indignation because they say a man like Aubrey Williams is not fit to carry on an Administration of this kind, and therefore we should keep these boys cut of school and strike this appropriation from the bill or reduce it by 50 percent. I can remember when Albert B. Fall was Secretary of the Interior and when they were actually stealing Teapot Dome. Somehow that did not stir the indignation of the Old Guard on the other side of the aisle.

I was here when Daugherty was Attorney General and when he was driven from power for misconduct in office. I did not hear that wave of indignation that seems to rise now every time someone of the minority party wants to criticize a part of the present administration.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I think if the gentleman will look back over the years, he will remember that some of us on this side did not approve of what happened at that time.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, yes. I am not putting the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] in that class at all.

But you had a man here by the name of Keller, from Minnesota, who introduced a resolution to impeach Daugherty for misconduct in office, and the Old Guard got on him so hard they drove him out of office and into a premature grave, and yet almost by the time the poor fellow was buried, Daugherty was driven from power for the very misconduct he charged him with.

Oh, I know something about what it is for a boy to work his way through college. I worked my way through school. Every dollar I ever spent in my life for school purposes I made myself.

You are spending a billion dollars for a Navy that everyone knows will be obsolete before the keels are laid. You are willing to spend hundreds of millions for military preparation for a war that everybody knows will not happen; but when it comes to giving these boys and girls an opportunity to prepare themselves to do the things in life they are going to have to do, then you rise in your indignation and attack Aubrey Williams. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] repeat this afternoon some of the statements he made yesterday with reference to Mr. Williams, particularly when he made the statement this afternoon that Mr. Williams "has shown himself capable of not teaching our young men Americanism." I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] ably answered that argument yesterday, and in my humble way I attempted to answer it, with other Members. All I have to say is that any man who, like Aubrey Williams, served his country during the World War, who served overseas in the American Expeditionary Force, and who was wounded, certainly has shown his loyalty to the great principles for which our Government stands. [Applause.]

In Massachusetts we have a State director, John L. Donovan, a very fine man. There is no politics in N. Y. A. in Massachusetts. I know nothing about other States. John L. Donovan had occasion to terminate the services of a woman employee who was secretly the wife of Manuel Blank, who is head of the Communist Party in Massachusetts, and Aubrey Williams supported John L. Donovan in his action in terminating her connection with the N. Y. A. when Mr. Donovan found out she was married to the Communist leader in Massachusetts.

You and I know that the Communists work into different organizations. They hide their identity. They are not concerned with numbers, but they penetrate and they want to get into pivotal positions so they can determine policies of an organization. They hide their identity. If they can, they get into all kinds of organizations. I found that out when I was chairman of the committee that investigated communism, nazi-ism, and fascism. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] found the same thing. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] and his associates on his committee are finding the same thing now.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. The gentleman is an able and outstanding member of the Ways and Means Committee. Will the gentleman tell the House whether he favors a debt-limit increase or a tax increase to pay for the increased expenditures that will be voted by this House and the other body?

Mr. MCCORMACK. The gentleman's question is not related to this but I will answer it. I never ducked a question upon which I have an opinion. I will sit down and prepare a tax bill. I am on record as in favor of increasing our taxes; and, if necessary, no matter which party is in office, if I am a Member of Congress next year and the Republicans should by the fortunes of politics be put into power and the recommendation were made to increase the $45,000,000,000 debt limit I would be for it if the man elected President should decide that it should be raised.

One observation in conclusion: This is an investment in the best interests of the country. The N. Y. A. steps into the present emergency as a stopgap, enabling hope to be held out to thousands of the youth of America. In addition to enabling them to be employed, they are receiving needed assistance. In other countries we witness dictators devoting unlimited attention to the youth of their land, indoctrinating them with anti-God and antidemocratic teachings, with hatred for others, the purpose of which is to perpetuate their dictatorship in power for at least another generation. They know if they can reach the youth of today, and indoctrinate them with their false teachings, that the probability is that they will retain power for at least a generation. The youth problem in the United States cannot be solved by inaction and inattention, as some advocate. There is more concerned than mere dollars and cents. When young men and women are unable to obtain employment due to the world-wide conflagration that has enveloped us, the appropriation made by the subcommittee, and the increase sought by the Johnson and the Collins amendments, administered through the National Youth Administration, constitutes an investment that will return large dividends in future years to our country and ourselves. This money is being spent to inculcate into the minds of our youth, particularly those who are the beneficiaries, the real meaning of democratic processes of government. The appropriation of this money gives hope in the future to thousands of the youth of our country. I submit that the Johnson amendment should be adopted. If it is not, then I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK].

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the amendment to increase the appropriation for the National Youth Administration. I feel it is necessary at this time. I think it is better to take the youth off the streets and the highways of this country and those places where so often they go astray and afoul of the law. I think it much better to put them in schools where they will be educated to make a living and become self-supporting. I do not care if we increase the Budget providing we can take care of the unemployed youths of this land who will be the future citizens of tomorrow to make and administer the laws of our country. For this reason I am going to support this amendment to increase the appropriation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to chide Members for their position with regard to matters of this sort. Although yours may not agree with mine, I realize you have your opinions and the right to adhere to your opinions just as I have the right to adhere to mine, but I do hope you will not see proper to adopt either one of these amendments; and I say this as one who is as deeply interested in the program of the National Youth Administration as any Member of this House could possibly be.

We must use some reason, some judgment, restrain our enthusiasm somewhat, in undertaking to make provision for those things we think highly desirable and beneficial to the people of our country. Who started this youth program? The President of the United States started it in 1935 by Executive order. How much did he provide for it? Approximately $42,000,000. The exact figures are $42,331,268 for the fiscal year 1936. In 1937 the amount was $65,000,000 approximately; in 1938 it was $48,000,000; in 1939 it was $74,997,762; and for the present fiscal year it was $99,979,240. The average for the 4 years is approximately $83,000,000. In stating these amounts, I have in mind the amounts actually allocated to N. Y. A., not amounts spent in its behalf by the Treasury Department for accounting or disbursement.

The amount reported in this bill for the National Youth Administration is $85,000,000, which is more than the average for the 4 years. If we are to have a successful program, we must not build it to proportions so elaborate that when taken together with appropriations made for other humanitarian agencies of the Government that are being carried on the total of the appropriations rise to the point where the credit of the Government may be unable to sustain the program, with the possible result that the whole structure will crash, and instead of getting the wonderful benefits we are receiving and should continue to anticipate through the C. C. C., the N. Y. A., and the other humanitarian activities of the present administration, the work of the last several years will, in effect, be destroyed through economy moves that may veer as far toward niggardliness as you are now being asked to veer toward extravagance. When you vote to increase the amount of the Budget estimate for this item you disagree with the President himself, who started this program and who says that the Budget estimate provides an amount sufficient for carrying it on in an orderly way, and you do not, in my opinion, vote for the benefit of the youth of America. You vote, in my judgment, to endanger further expansion and the possible successful continuance of this program. The man who votes for any and all increases in the amount proposed here by the Budget is not, in my judgment, thereby demonstrating his friendship for American youth.

I do not believe there is anything else I could say within the few minutes allowed me that would aid in your decision of the issue before the House. I desire to repeat that I feel the subcommittee have dealt as generously as it is possible for reasonable men to deal with this item in the appropriation bill. Every man on the committee had the interest of this program at heart. No man desired to hamper it in any way. All we desire is for it to be carried on in as extended a way as may be practicable under present financial conditions; and certainly we did not feel that the committee would be justified, or that the membership of the House would be justified in providing $15,000,000, or any other amount, in excess of the Budget estimates which we have approved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NICHOLS. In what order will the amendments on the Speaker's desk be voted on?

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first occur upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported in order that the House may be advised as to what it is voting on.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the Johnson amendment.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLER. When will the vote occur on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be the next amendment to be voted on.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the Committee divided, and there were—ayes 108, noes 111.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma and Mr. NICHOLS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. HARE and Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 144, noes 133.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NICHOLS) there were—ayes 147, noes 83.

Mr. NICHOLS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. SHEPPARD and Mr. NICHOLS to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 160, noes 101.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAYBURN, having resumed the chair, Mr. BUCK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9007, the Labor Department-Federal Security appropriation bill, 1941, had come to no resolution thereon.

MEDAL IN COMMEMORATION OF THE THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEVELOPMENT OF GREENWICH, CONN.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 7806) to authorize the striking of an appropriate medal in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the establishment of Greenwich, Conn., as a town.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the establishment of Greenwich, Conn., as a town, and the granting of a charter for such establishment, there shall be struck at a mint of the United States to be designated by the Director of the Mint 50,000 commemorative medals of a special appropriate single design, size, weight, and composition to be fixed by the Director of the Mint with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. Such commemorative medals shall be delivered to the duly authorized officers of Greenwich Tercentenary Committee upon payment to the Director of the Mint of an amount to be fixed by the Director of the Mint not less than the estimated cost of manufacture, including labor, materials, dies, use of machinery, and overhead expenses; and security satisfactory to the Directors of the Mint shall be furnished to indemnify the United States for the full payment of such cost.

SEC. 3. Whoever shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited or shall aid in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting any medal issued under the provisions of this act, or whoever shall sell or bring into the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof from any foreign place, or have in his possession any such false, forged, or counterfeited medal, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have discussed the appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole today may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD on that bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made today, and to incorporate in connection therewith certain tables which I have.

COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITY

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, once again the Special Committee on Un-American Activities has made the first page of the newspapers all over the country. This was accomplished by sending an airplane on a dash to my home city of Pittsburgh in order to pick up what it thought was a very renowned Communist. The facts as developed by the investigation of the matter are that the party which this committee went to the expense of sending an airplane to Pittsburgh for was a man well known to practically all Pittsburghers, a man who is at present on relief, drawing the sum of $4.40 a week from the relief authorities.

We authorized this committee to spend, I think, $75,000 this year. All the information obtained from this particular person could have been obtained by simply writing a letter to the Communist, who has avowed his principles by letters to newspapers and by every other method to the general public for years; and I protest against this sort of procedure, this waste of the taxpayers' money simply for publicity purposes.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks and to include in the RECORD at this point an editorial on this subject which appeared in the Pittsburgh Press of yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The editorial referred to follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Press of March 26, 1940]

WASTING GOOD MONEY

James H. Dolsen has been an active Communist in Pittsburgh for many years. So far as we know, he has never tried to hide his sympathies. He is registered as a Communist. And he has bombarded this newspaper for years with letters to the editor denouncing capitalism and lauding communism.

Considering that, we are surprised to see the Dies committee dramatically seize Dolsen, rush him to Washington by airplane, and hail him before the committee for questioning as if he were a person of mystery or importance. Aside from the questionable legality of such a method of corraling a witness, we never thought Dolsen was important enough, in Communist or any other circles, to rate such treatment, and such an expenditure of taxpayers' money. He is what is popularly known among newspapermen and politicians as a petty pest.

Even the intimation that Dolsen may be an Ogpu agent leaves us cold. We doubt very much if any espionage service, including that of the Russians, would engage as an agent somebody as blatant as Dolsen. Spies are supposed to be subtle people. Dolsen, in contrast, parades his communism at every opportunity and makes of himself a nuisance.

The whole procedure strikes us as rather silly and a waste of taxpayers' money. If the committee wanted to find out whether Dolsen is an ardent Communist, which is all they learned from questioning him yesterday, they could have done so simply by spending a 3-cent stamp on a letter.

Dolsen, and we speak from practical experience, would have respondent to the invitation to tell all about himself with a willingness that would have made gullible MARTIN DIES' head swim.

* * * * * * *

POSTSCRIPT: After this editorial was written the Dies committee cited Dolsen for contempt, because of refusal to answer certain questions. This is a perfect example of trying to make a whale out of a sardine. Here is an agitator of such trivial proportions that he's only worthy of serious attention by the relief authorities—from whom he gets $4.40 a week—treated as if he were an international spy from an E. Phillips Oppenheim novel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have printed in the RECORD in connection with the speech I made today an article which appeared in the Manchester Union Leader on the subject of wages and hours.

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and include therein several telegrams and letters regarding the wage and hour law.

STATE TITLE OF ALABAMA

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I had occasion to mention to this body that the World Almanac had referred to Alabama as the Lizard State. I never thought I would hear about it any more, and spoke only in the hope that we might induce the World Almanac to refrain from calling us the Lizard State. We are the Cotton State.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman desire to insert the World Almanac in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. PATRICK. Not the entire World Almanac. I thank the gentleman for suggesting it, however. It may be a good idea, but we will take that up at another time.

But it has resulted in the organization of a group called the Alabama Committee for Correction of State Titles. Incidentally, I suggest it would be a good idea for all States that are having troubles with State titles to take up the same idea. A resolution was drawn up by this group and forwarded to the Congress of the United States, but I shall not take the time to read it. E. Homer Brooks, of Birmingham, Ala. is president of the organization and chairman of the committee. It was suggested at its meeting by resolution that we get together as Representatives in Congress for the State of Alabama and provide that this State and all other States be protected from being arbitrarily dubbed with a wrong title. It could accidentally stick and refuse to be jarred loose and the State be forced to journey down the avenue of time with the door shut behind it. Therefore I wish to again, on the floor of Congress, remind the publishers and editors of that excellent work, the World Almanac, that the eyes of the Alabama Committee for Correction of State Titles is upon them and they would do well to think twice, or three times, before adopting a general policy of taking liberties with State titles. I thank you.

Whereas beach erosion in several of the municipalities bordering along the Atlantic Ocean in the State of New Jersey and particularly along the shores of Cape May County is continuing to an alarming extent, causing destruction of bathing beaches and valuable property of the public; and

Whereas these beaches are visited by large numbers of people in the summer months from all parts of the Nation seeking health and recreation; and

Whereas valuable tax property is being destroyed and finances of the municipalities are not sufficient to successfully combat this erosion; and

Whereas the loss caused by this erosion is one of national significance: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized to recognize the condition as set forth in the preamble of this resolution as one of national significance, and that such proper steps be taken to appropriate moneys sufficient in amount to give such financial aid as may be necessary to cope with the problem and directly aid the prevention of further erosion; and be it further

Mr. BARBOUR also presented the following resolution of the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas the Federal Government is about to take the decennial census of the inhabitants of the United States; and

Whereas there is a growing resentment from the people of New Jersey against certain of the proposed questions which they are to be interrogated upon, the claim being that they transgress their constitutional rights and privileges and tend to destroy the secrecy of their personal affairs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we members of the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey, having the best interests of our citizens at heart, do hereby oppose this proposed infringement upon the privacy of the personal affairs of our citizens; and be it further

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I hope to be as brief this morning as I may. In order to accomplish that purpose I shall confine myself to a discussion of the question of the delegation of power under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

In approaching the question of what is and what is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power, it is essential to remember that this is a matter which cannot be settled by the mere application of a rigid formula. The particular legal principle involved is laid down in the first line of article I of the Constitution, where it is stated that—

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States. * * *

Our courts and great jurists have recognized that this is one of the constitutional questions which, under our system of government, can be answered wisely only when the general legal principle has been illuminated by the underlying realities of our statecraft.

Coming directly to the Hampton case, Mr. President, Mr. Chief Justice Taft brought the whole question into clear focus in that case when he spoke of the flexible provisions of the act of 1922, as follows (Hampton Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 394):

> In determining what it [the Congress] may do in seeking assistance from another branch [the Executive], the extent and character of that assistance must be fixed according to common sense and the inherent necessities of the governmental coordination.

Further quoting:

> If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not forbidden delegation of legislative power.

The vital relationship of the Trade Agreements Act to the "common sense and inherent necessities of the governmental coordination," of which Mr. Chief Justice Taft spoke, is fully seen when we think of this act in its true bearing as an exercise by Congress of the power to regulate commerce rather than as a taxing measure. There cannot be the slightest doubt that this is the light in which the act would be appraised by our courts, as I attempted to show yesterday.

There is no need to review here the situation which required Congress to take this step to protect and promote our overseas commerce. The record of congressional consideration of this measure in 1934, 1937, and 1940 gives concrete and unmistakable meaning to the express statement in the act that it is a measure "for the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States."

Mr. President, it will be recalled that reference was made yesterday to the University of Illinois case; and I do not care to quote the language which I cited yesterday, but I do wish to quote a little further from the opinion in that case. This was said with reference to the Tariff Act:

> The purpose to regulate foreign commerce permeates the entire congressional plan. The revenue resulting from the duties "is an incident to such exercise of the power. It flows from but does not create the power."

The Trade Agreements Act is essentially an effort to regulate our foreign commerce so as to restore a mutual and beneficial flow of trade. As the greatest business community in the world, perhaps, we certainly know that there can be no one-way trade lane, that trade must be mutually profitable in order to be sustained at all.

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, in the quotation which I have already read, said further:

> Congress may, and undoubtedly does, in its tariff legislation consider the conditions of foreign trade in all its aspects and effects. Its requirements are not the less regulatory because they are not prohibitory or retaliatory.

In enacting the so-called flexible tariff provisions in 1922 and 1930 Congress was primarily concerned with attempting to regulate imports in accordance with difference in costs of production at home and abroad, a theory running through those two tariff acts. During recent years the situation of world trade was such that it was imperative for Congress to address itself quickly and effectively to another vital aspect of our foreign commerce theretofore largely neglected, namely, the distribution of our goods in foreign markets. That was a point which I undertook to emphasize in my address yesterday.

The Trade Agreements Act rests upon the principle of bargaining to open foreign channels of distribution and markets so as to restore a normal flow of trade. This could not be accomplished by merely dealing with tariff duties, which are only one means of regulating the flow of international trade. In fact, in many cases the principal restrictions to our trade encountered in other countries have not been tariffs but rather quotas, exchange control, and other more stringent forms of governmental regulation.

This is well illustrated in the Netherlands agreement. The Netherlands maintain a very low tariff, a tariff which might be properly described as a tariff for revenue. The general level of the Netherlands duties on exports from the United States to the Netherlands is probably in the neighborhood of 10 to 12 percent, but there were other measures which were adopted and which had to be guarded against in the agreement in order to continue the flow of commerce and trade with that government.

Mr. President, the Trade Agreements Act was designed to and in practice has permitted us to deal with all those varying types of trade regulation which have been used by other governments. Likewise, on our part we have in the trade agreements, whenever necessary, used such devices as customs quotas in order to permit the restoration of trade, and at the same time to safeguard the normal flow of trade from untoward developments.

Yesterday, at the conclusion of what I stated in the Senate, the question arose as to whether any court review was possible under the reciprocal-trade agreements. Some facts have been brought to my attention, and on further reflection I think there is no question of doubt that the quotas proclaimed by the President, imposed under the Trade Agreements Act, open the way for a definite and clear test of the validity and constitutionality of the Trade Agreements Act.

Under section 514 of the Tariff Act I think, on reflection, the conclusion is compelled that when imports from a given country reach the level of the quota fixed by the United States, and any importer is then denied the right to bring in further merchandise of a particular description, the way is open in the courts for a fair, square, direct, and immediate test of the constitutionality of the whole act, because the quotas have been fixed, as well as duties modified or changed within the 50 percent range, up or down, under the Trade Agreements Act.

Perhaps there are other ways in which the question can be raised, but I do not believe there is a doubt that the question can be raised, and can be raised now, because the quota imposed upon certain Canadian imports certainly will reach, if it has not already reached, the limit of the quota. The moment that limit is reached, it is open to any importer, or to any person desiring to import a further quantity of the articles subject to the quota, to raise the question of validity of the quota imposed under the Trade Agreements Act.

Mr. President, the Congress could not effectively deal with this situation in any other way than by setting up a flexible procedure which could operate through negotiations with the various foreign countries. We all understand that there must be a certain amount of flexibility in handling any problem by negotiation. This point I tried to emphasize yesterday in the debate.

Let us see, now, whether the principle declared in the Trade Agreements Act is an intelligible principle laid down by the legislative branch of the Government within the rule in the Hampton case, in which case there was a unanimous decision of the Supreme Court. The Trade Agreements Act has but one purpose—and I invite Senators who are now present to follow what I am about to say as closely as they can, in view of other things which may be somewhat distracting. The Trade Agreements Act has but one purpose, namely, "expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States." The Congress has prescribed the limitations and policies to which the President must conform in carrying out this purpose through the negotiation of foreign trade agreements. The law fixes a basic limitation, in the first place, of 50 percent within which tariff modifications may be made. Within this basic limitation, the President must adhere to the policy prescribed in the act of—

> Regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production, and so that foreign markets will be made available * * * by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States.

Thus, the adjustments made must be determined, within the basic 50-percent limitation, by both "the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production" and the "corresponding market opportunities" which are made available to American producers by the concessions secured from the other government in the agreement.

The tariff adjustments made under the act are subject both to the basic limitation of 50-percent changes and the facts found in regard to the needs and characteristics of various branches of American production. The actual determination of the rates within these two limitations is governed by the corresponding market opportunities for American producers which the other government makes available by its concessions. In short, within the bargaining range fixed by the two limitations mentioned above, the trade-agreement tariff rates and the other provisions for regulating the flow of our foreign commerce are determined pursuant to the intelligible principle of bargaining for "corresponding market opportunities."

Mr. President, the act provides further that only such tariff modifications may be made as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement. This means that only those products may be affected which are of sufficient interest to a foreign country to warrant its agreeing on its part to grant compensatory concessions on our exports.

It will be seen that the bargaining process prescribed in the act constitutes a very definite limitation on the items which may be dealt with at all, as well as a standard or principle, as has been stated above, which guides the Executive in determining the actual reductions which are to be made.

Finally, it is to be noted that no agreement may be entered into unless the President finds as a fact that existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or of the foreign country in question are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States, and that the purpose of the act will be promoted by such an agreement.

It can be stated emphatically that the experience of the past 6 years, during which some 20 trade agreements have been concluded, has demonstrated that these limitations and standards have real significance in guiding the action of the Executive in carrying out the policy laid down by Congress.

In the first place, the basic 50-percent limitation prescribed by the law has cut the field of possible action in half. Secondly, before negotiations are commenced with any country the interdepartmental trade agreements organization, which is made up of experts representing the Tariff Commission, and the Departments of State, Agriculture, Commerce, and Treasury, and other interested Government agencies, makes a thorough study of each product which might be the subject of a concession by this country to the other country. In the case of each such item the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production are carefully studied and as the result of these studies some items are eliminated from consideration entirely, on other items the particular reductions which might be justified, within the 50-percent range of action, are determined by the facts found with respect to the characteristics and needs of domestic production.

At this point, Mr. President, I wish to insert the statement of Commissioner Fox, of the Tariff Commission, before the Committee on Ways and Means, descriptive of the factual inquiries made and of the actual steps taken in the negotiation of a reciprocal-tariff agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

Under the reciprocal trade agreements program, involving as it does complex and highly technical problems, there has been developed an effective procedure for gathering and analyzing factual data, and a system of checks and balances has been evolved. To insure the proper consideration of the material gathered, a number of agencies have been set up. Before any agreement is formulated, these agencies examine thoroughly all available information bearing on the trade between the United States and the country with which negotiations are under consideration. To this work are assigned competent technical, economic, and other experts, who review and sift the mass of pertinent information furnished by domestic producers, trade associations, and others interested in the commodities that may be affected.

Since the trade agreements program was initiated during the depression, each agreement had to be planned with extreme caution. The selection of commodities on which the rates of duty were to be reduced demanded meticulous care. To effect any modification of trade barriers by foreign countries the United States had to reduce some of the tariffs, but tariffs could not be indiscriminately reduced. The level to which particular rates could be lowered and the effect of each change had to be judiciously weighed. This could best be done by experts and organizations qualified to examine objectively the economic and competitive factors affecting the trade in each commodity.

Since tariff revision by Executive authority through negotiations with foreign governments represents a new procedure in American administrative practice, new machinery had to be created. New agencies had to be set up and a new procedure developed for handling the work. Direct responsibility for the work is vested in the Department of State, which has charge of the actual negotiations of all agreements. All departments interested, however, are represented on interdepartmental committees; these committees assist in the preparation of the necessary material, review all data, consider all problems, and make decisions subject to approval by higher officials. As a result of the 5 years' operation of the trade agreements program, there is now closer cooperation between the departments in foreign trade matters than ever before.

The agencies and steps involved in the trade-agreements procedure are as follows:

A. Agencies:
1. Trade Agreements Division.
2. Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee.
   (a) Country subcommittees.
   (b) Commodity subcommittees.
   (c) Special subcommittees.
3. Committee for Reciprocity Information.

B. Procedure:
1. Exploration.
2. Formal notice of intention to negotiate.
3. Hearings by Committee for Reciprocity Information.
4. Studies by committees.
5. Negotiations.
6. Proclamation.

From our observation, no other country in the world has our facilities for gathering the underlying facts. In a number of the agreements negotiated there were instances of our having more complete information regarding trade matters for the particular country than did its negotiators.

A. AGENCIES

1. Trade Agreements Division of State Department: Upon the passage of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, the Department of State created a new division, that of Trade Agreements. This Division handles all trade-agreement matters in the Department of State and coordinates the trade-agreement activities of the different departments. The Chief of this Division is Mr. Harry Hawkins. In 30 years' experience inside and outside the Government, I have met few men more conscientious or with finer character and greater ability than Mr. Hawkins.

2. Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee: This committee is composed of representatives of the Departments of State, Commerce, Agriculture, and Treasury, and of the United States Tariff Commission. The Chief of the Trade Agreements Division of the State Department is its chairman.

The Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee directs all necessary studies, reviews the reports and recommendations of its subcommittees, and approves, subject to final approval by the Secretary of State and the President, all details of the agreements. This committee in turn has organized a number of supporting committees, the most important of which are the "country" committees.

(a) Country subcommittees: For each country with which a trade agreement is contemplated, or is in process, a subcommittee is organized. It is composed of representatives from the various departments. Each country committee prepares reports giving the economic background and the trade between the United States and the country with which an agreement is contemplated, together with a detailed analysis of the economic factors pertinent to each commodity concerning which a concession is to be considered.

The representatives of the Tariff Commission supply these committees with data concerning each import item on which a concession may be granted to the particular country. The representatives of the Commerce Department furnish the data on export items on which the United States may request concessions. Experts of the Department of State prepare the so-called general provisions of each trade agreement, and the Department of Agriculture furnishes special information on agricultural commodities. The representatives of the Treasury supply information on customs and tariff classifications.

The country and trade-agreements committee are in a position to take a realistic view of the concessions the particular country is likely to demand and of its attitude toward our requests, for the committee, usually has sitting with them, during the preparation and review of the basic material, and sometimes during the negotiations, the American commercial attaché stationed in that country. The country subcommittees report directly to the Trade Agreements Interdepartmental Committee. I want to point out, too, that the members of these country committees do not have an easy time when they come before the Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee. They must be prepared on the basic economic facts to be considered and they must be able to defend any suggestion they make. And, likewise, the trade-agreements committee must be able to justify its recommendations before the higher officials.

These country subcommittees continue in existence even after the trade agreement has been consummated, watching carefully the import and export trade with the particular country and being ready to help solve any trade agreement problem that may arise pertaining to the country. It must be obvious that the members of the country committees, selected in the first instance for their expert knowledge, have had the opportunity to become thoroughly versed in the trade of the country and the economic problems relating thereto.

Some idea of the comprehensiveness of the study made for each country may be had from a statement concerning the volume of material gathered for the agreement with Belgium. The summarized analytical data on the commodities for which concessions to Belgium were to be considered covered 15 large volumes each the size of a large telephone book and filled one section of a standard office bookcase. Although concessions were ultimately made to Belgium on only 47 items, studies were made for 165 commodities on which concessions might conceivably have been made to that country. Many of these items were rejected for concessions by the various committees even though no representations respecting them had been made by interested parties.

Following the proclamation of practically every trade agreement made, the United States Tariff Commission has prepared a document containing digests of the trade data with respect to products on which concessions were made to the particular country. Such documents have been prepared for Belgium, Brazil, Canada (two), Czechoslovakia, Finland, the Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, and the United Kingdom.

The United States Tariff Commission is a fact-finding and fact-reporting agency. It is now, and has been ever since its creation in 1916, an independent organization. At all times, the major task of its staff of experts is to keep abreast of developments in their respective fields in the United States and elsewhere and to have up-to-date information respecting them. The Commission is thus always prepared to serve the Congress and the President with data on any tariff or import item and to cooperate with other Government departments or agencies in matters pertaining to import and foreign trade.

It may be of interest for me to describe how a digest of information for any particular product is prepared in the Tariff Commission before its representative on the country committee submits it to that committee. The digest is prepared in the first instance by an economist working in conjunction with a commodity expert. It is then reviewed by the chief of the commodity division concerned and by another economist, then examined by the Commission's planning and reviewing committee, then finally reviewed by a subcommittee of the Commissioners. During the past year this subcommittee of Commissioners happens to be composed of the three Republican members of the Commission. The digest is then submitted by the representative of the Commission to the particular country committee for consideration and for suggestions as to changes in duty, the Tariff Commission representative being one of the committee.

The meetings of the country committee are held in the Tariff Commission offices when import items are considered, and commodity experts familiar with the subjects under consideration are invariably called into the meeting for consultation and participation in the discussion. These experts are also present when the subjects are considered by the interdepartmental trade-agreements committee. Oftentimes, when there is need for information in addition to the large fund already available in the Tariff Commission's files, a commodity expert and an economist are sent into the field to consult with the domestic producers and importers in order to obtain such additional information.

The nature of the information covered for any particular product in the digest prepared by the Tariff Commission for the country committee may also be of interest. Not all of the items which I am going to list are included for each product, but certainly all that have any pertinency to the product and for which data are available. The list I am going to read really constitutes a check list, the purpose of which is to make certain that all economic phases of each product are covered.

(b) Commodity subcommittees: For the most important commodities or groups of commodities there are also "commodity" committees upon which technical exports from the various governmental departments serve. These committees assemble all essential information with respect to their commodities, and study the effects which changes in rates of duty on these commodities might have upon the economic situation in the industry or upon other industries.

I hold in my hand the textile commodity report with reference to Belgium. In this report is given a detailed story with respect to every textile item on which Belgium might conceivably ask a concession from us, and also a detailed story with respect to each textile item respecting items on which we might get a concession from Belgium. As a result of that sort of a study made by commodity experts, the various committees are able to get a realistic picture of each particular commodity or group of commodities.

(c) Special subcommittees: The special subcommittees were appointed to study complicated economic problems such as quotas, monetary and foreign exchange, and tariff reclassifications.

3. Committee for Reciprocity Information: I turn now to the Committee that we have heard discussed a number of times today, the Committee for Reciprocity Information—another important instrument for carrying out the trade-agreements program. This Committee, created by Executive order of June 27, 1934, is composed of the Vice Chairman of the Tariff Commission, who is the Committee Chairmain, and representatives of the Departments of State, Agriculture, Commerce, and Treasury.

Upon the announcement that a trade agreement is to be undertaken with a particular country, a date for a public hearing is set, 30 or more days thereafter, and a date for the filing of briefs. The purpose of this hearing is to give an opportunity to interested parties (producers, importers, exporters, and consumers) to appear and present information upon the particular subjects in which they are interested. In the hearings held thus far and in the briefs filed thus far, parties at interest have usually set forth the reasons why particular rates of duty should or should not be reduced, have called attention to specific restrictions in foreign countries which deterred the flow of trade, and have attempted to show what concessions should be sought from the foreign country with which negotiations are undertaken. Transcripts of each hearing, together with all briefs submitted and all correspondence on each subject, are summarized carefully by the technical experts and economists of the Tariff Commission, and the summarized statements are circulated among the members of the country and trade-agreements committees, and other interested Government officials. This new service assures consideration of the representations of all interested parties.

I hold in my hand here the digest of the hearings of the agreement with Belgium. The first part, the green sheets, consists of summary statements of the witnesses in regard to export items. The yellow sheets in the back, and you see there are very many more of them, cover the statements of witnesses who appeared in regard to import items.

Now, in addition to these statements, a brief summary of all correspondence is circulated among the members of the Committee for Reciprocity Information. Nobody ever appears, files a brief, or sends a letter to that Committee in regard to any trade-agreement matter without the information so submitted being summarized and put before the people who are going to have anything at all to do with the trade agreements.

Besides the summaries above referred to the original briefs and letters are available to those who are going to have a part in the negotiations and in the working up of the agreement.

In addition to its formal hearings, the Committee for Reciprocity Information holds many conferences with interested parties. The Chairman and executive secretary of the Committee are constantly available for interviews with persons having questions to ask concerning trade-agreement matters.

During the last 5 years the Committee for Reciprocity Information has been reorganized and its personnel strengthened. Practically all members are now also members of the Trade Agreements Committee. When a hearing is announced, there is published a list of the commodities for the use of interested parties in order that they may know definitely the import items which may be involved in the negotiations. These are only a few of the many improvements which have been made in procedure during the last 5 years.

Service on these various committees has brought together men and women who are peculiarly qualified to deal with the subjects under consideration. To them the records and information, both public and confidential, of the various Departments have been made available. On numerous occasions technical Government experts have been called before these committees as consultants. Most of the members of these committees, together with a large supporting staff in a number of the Government Departments, devote all of their time—days, nights, and holidays over considerable periods—to trade-agreements work. It is their main job.

Now, as to the procedure under the trade-agreements program. I shall describe briefly these six steps listed here. But before I leave the question of agencies, I want to say that what is done in the trade agreements by any of these trade-agreement agencies and in any of those proceedings is no mystery. It is the very same thing that the members of the Ways and Means Committee do. They are conscientious in the service they render their country.

You may not always agree with the result, but as far as the procedure is concerned I don't think there is any possibility of disagreement.

B. PROCEDURE

First then as to exploration. When an interest is manifested in a particular trade agreement, the interdepartmental trade agreement committee has a special study made for the particular country. If this special study leads to the conclusion that an agreement is feasible, the possibility of making such a trade arrangement is explored through diplomatic channels. Without publicity all phases of the trade relations between the two countries are analyzed and the problems outlined. During these explorations a friendly search is made for solutions to these problems.

Now, let us, without revealing anything out of school, assume that we face the period prior to the announcement of the British trade agreement. Don't you believe for one moment that the question of preference didn't come up and that had England been unwilling to modify those preferential treatments you would never have had the second step—an announcement to negotiate. So during this first exploratory period some of the outstanding difficulties are often cleared away. If they can't be cleared no one hears about it. If they can we go on to the next step.

Now, the second step is the formal notice of intention to negotiate and the publication of a list of concession items. When it is determined that an agreement is possible, a formal notice of intention to negotiate is published by the Secretary of State, together with a list of products on which the United States will consider granting concessions. This list is sometimes supplemented by other lists, but not all products in the list will finally be included in the trade agreement, should one be consummated. Simultaneously the Committee for Reciprocity Information issues notice of the date of public hearing and of the last date for submission of briefs.

Then comes the third step—the public hearings by the Committee for Reciprocity Information, at which interested parties are given an opportunity to present their cases. These are followed, as I have indicated, by many conferences and interviews.

Studies by committees: After the members of the country committee have carefully reviewed all available data gathered for it by the experts of the various departments, or presented by interested parties before the Committee for Reciprocity Information, or prepared by special committees organized from time to time, they report to the Trade Agreements Committee. Their report gives the essential economic background for the particular country, the outstanding restrictions that should be removed or modified, and detailed economic information and recommendations concerning each commodity on which it is suggested that a concession be granted to, or requested from, the other country. After considering this report, the Trade Agreements Committee prepares a special report, setting forth the concessions which it recommends, for review by State Department and other high Government officials and for final approval by the President of the United States.

Actual negotiations: Now, the next step is the actual negotiations. One of the gentlemen on the committee this morning asked: "Why don't you at the very beginning, at the early part of the operations, choose negotiators?" Well, our method is far superior. A few members of the Country and Trade Agreements Committees, serving as negotiators, undertake actual negotiations with representatives of the foreign country. One of the negotiating group is invariably an experienced negotiator from the Department of State who has previously served as a member of the country committee. After months of conferences during which many problems are referred back to the Country and Trade Agreements Committees, a tentative trade agreement is prepared. This is given careful review by both the particular country committee and the Trade Agreements Committee before it is recommended for official acceptance.

I want to make another point concerning the committees that I have described and the procedure which I have indicated. Let us assume that the men who are assigned in the first place to a country committee or to any step in the proceedings are dumbbells. And we try not to pick dumbbells. We choose men for their particular expertness. Certainly by the time they are through working on a particular country they have become thoroughly versed, not only in the problems of that country but with respect to the problems in our country of the products which that country supplies us.

The proclamation: Finally, the President of the United States, after his review and formal approval of the agreement by the foreign government, issues a proclamation putting the agreement into effect and prescribing the date for its enforcement.

The new rates apply to all countries except those whose treatment of American commerce the President has found to be discriminatory, or such as tends to defeat the purposes of the Trade Agreements Act.

This recital of procedure should suffice to show that, before any trade agreement is formulated, all available information regarding our trade with the country concerned is carefully scrutinized. Technical, economic, and other experts in the several departments are consulted, and all information furnished by interested parties is carefully reviewed. It must be obvious that there are many and varying points of view and that there is a great deal of study, deliberation, and debate before final decision in any matter is reached. Some decisions represent a compromise of conflicting views, but no decision is reached without carefully weighing the economic consequences of each action or consideration of the general public's interest.

Opinions may differ as to the merits of any particular action taken under the trade-agreements program, but it is difficult to see how anyone familiar with the procedure which I have outlined can fail to be impressed by its thoroughness. Those who have carefully followed the trade-agreements program admit that a new tariff technique far in advance of previous methods is being developed.

The trade-agreements program has an excellent personnel, a good, constantly improving procedure, and scientific technique; it assumes a rational, common-sense attitude; there are adequate checks and balances; a keen desire to be guided by general public interest; and increasing evidence that every action is being watched to safeguard and protect the legitimate interests of American producers, agriculture, and labor.

May I, in conclusion, read the following statement:

"I will also stress the fact that in carrying out the trade-agreement policy by Mr. Hull, great credit should be given to the fact there has been no suspicion of political influence regarding the reduction in duties on any article placed on the reciprocal-trading list. I believe that everyone who has had occasion to contact the staff that makes up the schedules must admit that regardless of whether we approve of the policy or not, the agreements are prepared solely from the viewpoint of endeavoring to increase foreign trade with the least injury to domestic industries."

This statement was made by none other than Mr. William L. Munro, president of the American Tariff League at the annual meeting of that organization in 1938.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, in many cases these determinations with respect to the characteristics and needs actually fix a further limitation in the case of particular items which narrows the range of the negotiations much more than the basic 50-percent limit. Thereafter, and only within the range fixed either by the basic limit of 50-percent change or the limitation fixed by the characteristics and needs of each branch of production, depending upon which is the more restrictive limitation, the actual negotiations take place. Within the range fixed by these limitations the actual reductions made in our duties are determined by the principle of bargaining for reciprocal concessions which will afford corresponding market opportunities. That is almost identically the legislative principle declared in the tariff act which was discussed yesterday, and which was reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In many cases this bargaining standard has itself cut down the amount of the reduction which we might otherwise have made within the limitations fixed by the 50-percent base or the facts found with respect to the characteristics and needs of domestic production. If the other country is not willing to grant us concessions which in one form or another give us corresponding market opportunities, then the very application of this bargaining standard results in our cutting down the size of the concessions which we would otherwise be warranted in granting.

In short, negotiations under the Trade Agreements Act with respect to the reduction of our tariff rates are never carried on below the limits fixed by the 50-percent base and the characteristics and needs found to be applicable to specific items; and within the bargaining range established by these limits the actual reductions are made only in accordance with the corresponding market opportunities which are afforded to American export products by the other country's concessions.

Manifestly, these limitations and standards constitute an intelligible principle or standard for the guidance of the Executive which, in the words of Chief Justice Taft, accords with "common sense and the inherent necessities of the governmental coordination." These limitations and standards compare very favorably with the standards contained in the flexible provisions of the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930 which authorized the Executive to adjust tariff rates on the basis of the difference between the cost of production of goods in the United States and foreign countries, or to change tariff rates or to exclude articles from importation on the basis of findings of—

> Unfair methods of competition and unfair acts * * * the effect or tendency of which is to destroy or substantially injure an industry, efficiently and economically operated * * * or to prevent the establishment of such an industry, or to restrain or monopolize trade and commerce.

The quotation is from the Tariff Act of 1930.

These provisions were upheld by the courts in the case of Hampton Co. v. United States (276 U. S. 394), Frischer v. Bakelite Corp. (39 Fed. (2d) 247), and Frischer v. Elting (60 Fed. (2d) 711). I believe the latter case was a circuit court of appeals decision.

The same favorable comparison is to be found between the standards of the Trade Agreements Act and the reciprocally unequal and unreasonable standard of the reciprocity provisions of the Dingley Act of 1890, which was upheld in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649). Certainly the standards laid down in the Trade Agreements Act are no degree less precise than the "just and reasonable" and "necessary or desirable in the public interest" standards which have been prescribed for the guidance of the Interstate Commerce Commission in regulating railroad rates under the interstate-commerce clause and which have been upheld by the courts. In the case of Federal Communications Commission against Pottsville Broadcasting Co., decided by the Supreme Court January 29, 1940, Mr. Justice Frankfurter said with respect to the statutory provisions governing the regulation of broadcasting—and I invite the careful attention of Senators who are present to this excerpt:

> In granting or withholding permits for the construction of stations, and in granting, denying, modifying, or revoking licenses for the operation of stations—> public convenience, interest, or necessity was the touchstone for the exercise of the Commission's authority. While this criterion is as concrete as the complicated factors for judgment in such a field of delegated authority permit, it serves as a supple instrument for the exercise of discretion by the expert body which Congress has charged to carry out its legislative policy. * * *

Thus, even tested by the constitutional principles which govern legislation which does not involve international affairs the Trade Agreements Act is clearly supported by the precedents and the court decisions. However, as has been stated above, this act is in fact directly and importantly related to our international affairs. The Trade Agreements Act was predicated upon the vital necessity of adopting a procedure which would permit Congress to fulfill its responsibility to regulate our foreign commerce so as to relieve and protect our overseas trade from excessive and arbitrary interference by foreign governments. The express purpose of the act is to expand foreign markets for American products; and this purpose is to be achieved, and under the circumstances can only be achieved, by negotiations with the foreign governments which control and regulate access to those markets. Viewed in this light alone the act stands squarely within the bounds of the Constitution as laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation (299 U. S. 304 (1936)), where it was stated that:

> It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved.

Some opponents of the trade-agreements program have attempted to distinguish the Curtiss-Wright case. It has been said that no question of delegation of power was involved, as the Executive was merely exercising his constitutional powers in the field of foreign affairs. This clearly is not so. The action taken by the President in prohibiting the sale of arms and munitions of war in the United States to the countries engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco was solely an exercise of the power which was delegated to him by the Congress. The Executive, in the field of foreign affairs, or elsewhere, has no authority himself to prohibit sales or to lay embargoes—he gets that power only when and as Congress vests it in him. The delegation-of-power issue was directly raised in the Curtiss-Wright case. Mr. Justice Sutherland stated the issue as follows:

> It is contended that by the joint resolution the going into effect and continued operation of the resolution was conditioned (a) upon the President's judgment as to its beneficial effect upon the reestablishment of peace between the countries engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco; (b) upon the making of a proclamation, which was left to his unfettered discretion, thus constituting an attempted substitution of the President's will for that of Congress; (c) upon the making of a proclamation putting an end to the operation of the resolution, which again was left to the President's unfettered discretion; and (d) further, that the extent of its operation in particular cases was subject to limitation and exception by the President, controlled by no standard. In each of these particulars appellees urge that Congress abdicated its essential functions and delegated them to the Executive.

The Court rejected each of these contentions, stating that—

> Both upon principle and in accordance with precedent, we conclude there is sufficient warrant for the broad discretion vested in the President.

The foreign-affairs aspect of this case related to the fact that the President was authorized to exercise the power by proclamation only after he had found that such action might contribute to the reestablishment of peace between those countries, and after he had consulted with other governments with a view to securing their cooperation. In the case of the Trade Agreements Act the conduct of our foreign affairs is, if anything, more directly involved, since the authority granted to the President can only be exercised through international agreements. Likewise, contrary to the suggestion made by some, there is a direct parallel between the objectives of the arms-embargo resolution and the Trade Agreements Act—both are primarily and directly concerned with effecting a change in a foreign situation. In the case of the arms embargo the purpose was to contribute to peace in the Chaco by prohibiting the sale of arms in the United States. In the Trade Agreements Act the purpose is to restore and protect our markets in foreign countries by permitting the sale of certain foreign goods in this country through carefully regulated reductions of our tariffs. The striking parallel between these two acts on the constitutional question is inescapable as long as the purpose and true nature of the trade-agreements program is kept in mind. It is a program for the restoration of a flow of foreign trade, and the adjustment of our tariffs is merely a means of effecting that objective and not the objective.

Mr. President, I wish to read very briefly from an opinion in which the Court held that the delegation of power was an unauthorized delegation and that, therefore, the particular provision of the act under consideration was void. I do not care to read at length, although the opinion is an exhaustive one. The opinion is by the able Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Mr. President, we often find what the law is by reading a case which holds to the contrary of what we have immediately under consideration. I think that a reading of the case of Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan (293 U. S. 388) at the October 1934 term of the Supreme Court illustrates the point I have tried to make. The Chief Justice, speaking for the Court in that case, found that section 9 (c) of the old National Recovery Administration Act constituted an attempt unlawfully to delegate legislative powers. The Chief Justice says of that section:

> Section 9 (c) * * * does not attempt to control the production of petroleum and petroleum products within a State. It does not seek to lay down rules for the guidance of State legislatures or State officers. It leaves to the States and to their constituted authorities the determination of what production shall be permitted. It does not qualify the President's authority by reference to the basis or extent of the State's limitation of production. Section 9 (c) does not state whether, or in what circumstances, or under what conditions the President is to prohibit the transportation of the amount of petroleum or petroleum products produced in excess of the State's permission.

Let me read that again:

> Section 9 (c) does not state whether, or in what circumstances, or under what conditions the President is to prohibit the transportation of the amount of petroleum or petroleum products produced in excess of the State's permission.

It establishes no criterion to govern the President's course. It does not require any finding by the President as a condition of his action. The Congress, in section 9 (c), thus declares no policy as to the transportation of the excess production. So far as this section is concerned, it gives to the President an unlimited authority to determine the policy and to lay down the prohibition, or not to lay it down, as he may see fit. And disobedience to his order is made a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Even in that case there was a dissent, although it seems that the Court stood upon perfectly sound ground. There was a dissent by that eminent Associate Justice, now deceased, Mr. Justice Cardozo, in which he said that it was the duty of the Court not merely to scrutinize the language of the particular section but to look through the entire act to find, if possible, whether or not the legislative branch of the Government had laid down an intelligible principle. He thought that he had found such an intelligible principle; but it is to be noted, Mr. President, as the Supreme Court said in that case, that even when the President found facts to exist which he was not required to find, he then had the final decision as to whether he would issue his proclamation prohibiting the transportation of petroleum or petroleum products in interstate commerce, or whether he would withhold such proclamation. In that case, as I see it, the Congress clearly had not placed any duty upon the President after having laid down an intelligible principle for his guidance.

Mr. President, I think there is a misconception—which I formerly held—in regard to the delegation of legislative power. I hold to the view—and I think it is a correct one—that Congress may not delegate legislative power. In its true sense legislative power must be retained by the Congress. I think there has been a misconception—and I confess that I also have held to that view, as I have just said—of what the Congress must do in order to delegate its proper power. We have talked about yardsticks. In none of the opinions is there any requirement for an exact yardstick. It is true that in some cases the Court has said, "Here is an exact measure, a standard which we can apply." However, in the case which directly reaches this question, the Hampton case, the Chief Justice, speaking for the whole Court, said:

> It may be that it is difficult to fix with exactness this difference—

That is, the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home—> but the difference which is sought in the statute is perfectly clear and perfectly intelligible.

Mr. President, I very well remember the testimony of Chairman O'Brien, a Republican member of the Tariff Commission under the Hoover administration, who in his appearance before the Finance Committee said that it was practically impossible exactly to measure the cost of production abroad against the cost of production of an article at home.

Continuing to quote from the Chief Justice in the Hampton case:

> Because of the difficulty in practically determining what that difference is, Congress seemed to have doubted that the information in its possession was such as to enable it to make the adjustment accurately, and also to have apprehended that with changing conditions the difference might vary in such a way that some readjustments would be necessary to give effect to the principle on which the statute proceeds. To avoid such difficulties, Congress adopted in section 315 the method of describing with clearness what its policy and plan was and then authorizing a member of the executive branch to carry out this policy and plan.

Mr. President, to repeat what I have already said, or what I have already quoted, the rule laid down is not a yardstick, is not a fixed standard, a definite standard which may be applied with mathematical precision; but the rule is:

> If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rate is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power. If it is thought wise to vary the customs duty according to changing conditions of production at home and abroad, it may authorize the Chief Executive to carry out this purpose, with the advisory assistance of a Tariff Commission appointed under congressional authority.
> This conclusion is amply sustained by a case in which there was no advisory commission furnished the President—a case to which this Court gave the fullest consideration nearly 40 years ago.

Citing the case of Field against Clark.

In this decision the basic principle bearing directly on the point of analogy between the Court decision sustaining the Interstate Commerce Act and the flexible provision in the Tariff Act is repeated and is emphasized.

So, Mr. President, I pass from the consideration of the two legal questions involved in this case with the statement that undoubtedly in the Trade Agreements Act an intelligible principle is laid down. It is first said that the whole field of negotiation must be cut in half, because the President cannot raise rates more than 50 percent, and he cannot reduce rates more than 50 percent. In the second place, the field is again circumscribed by the competitive circumstances and needs of the producer in the United States, by competitive conditions, using a shorter term; and, in the third place, the field is further restricted by prescribing that the kind of bargaining which may be made, within the limitations indicated, shall be such as will procure equal treatment of our exports into the foreign country with which the trade agreement is made. Finally, Mr. President, the legislature has said that not one piece of machinery in the Trade Agreements Act can be made to turn unless the President shall find as a fact that the tariff duties or restrictions upon our commerce imposed under our Tariff Act, or the duties or restrictions imposed by the foreign country, are unduly burdening the flow of our foreign commerce.

There is an intelligible principle; I have no doubt in my own mind that it is an intelligible principle. It is difficult of application, perhaps impossible of exact application, as the Court said in the Hampton case and as Commissioner O'Brien admitted in his testimony before the Finance Committee; yet the intelligible principle is there, and a body of expert men, working conscientiously under the direction of the Departments of State, Commerce, Agriculture, and Treasury, and the Tariff Commission, representing particularly the State Department and the President of the United States, can apply the intelligible principle enunciated in this act.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's train of thought.

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I simply desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that Chief Justice Taft was President of the United States in 1910, and he suggested the very same standard long before the Hampton case, when he said in 1910:

> When we understand that the cost of production differs in one country abroad from that in another, and that it changes from year to year and from month to month, we must realize that the precise difference in cost of production sought is not capable of definite ascertainment, and that all that even the most scientific person can do in his investigation is, after consideration of many facts which he learns, to exercise his best judgment in reaching a conclusion.

So it seems that before the Hampton case was decided the same standard was set up.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator for reading from President Taft, because it illustrates the whole meaning of his decision when he finally reached the conclusion that there is not an exact yardstick, not a standard that can be mathematically administered, but there is an intelligible principle which lies within the power of the Congress to lay down. That is the legislative act, and the mere administration of that act is in the body selected by the Congress to carry out its will.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. In order to amplify what the Senator from Georgia is now discussing and what the Senator from Missouri has said, I wish to make this observation.

Thomas W. Page, who at one time was Chairman of the Tariff Commission, in discussing the cost-of-production formula at the time the Hampton case was under consideration, said:

> To use as the basis of a general tariff act a thing so fleeting, evasive, and shadowy would be neither right nor possible.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that is correct.

Now, Mr. President, I am about to conclude. I apologize to the Senate for having detained it so long.

Yesterday the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], near the conclusion of his address, took occasion to refer to the equality of treatment provided in the most-favored-nation clause of the numerous agreements we have negotiated, and took occasion also to call attention to the fact that in the present disturbed condition of the world, with war raging in so many different quarters, it would be unwise to renew this authority in the President.

In the hearings before the Finance Committee, the distinguished Senator raised this precise question. He raised it while Mr. Rogers was appearing before the committee. Mr. Rogers is not only a member of the Senator's party but he was Assistant Secretary of State in charge of commercial treaties during the Hoover administration. Senator VANDENBERG propounded this question:

> Senator VANDENBERG. I so completely agree with your statement about the need for flexibility in the present and prospective condition of the world that I do not see how in the world you can rely on as narrow an instrumentality as the trade agreements, which deal almost solely with rates, to meet the impacts we are going to confront. You have already said that the external world is shot through with what you call mercantilism already, bilateral agreements—1,500 of them in the last few years—extreme protectionism; self-containment all around, blocked exchange, embargoes, subsidies—how are you going to deal with all those menaces to our trade through the relative inflexibility even of a trade-agreements program?

Mr. Rogers answered:

> Every choice of a political policy, Senator, is a choice between a bundle of strengths and weaknesses. Any political policy has its weaknesses. This is a question of the net result proportionately of the strengths and weaknesses, and the varying types of policy we can follow. My judgment is, as I was trying to say, that the weaknesses for the United States, particularly in a bilateral bargaining policy, are infinitely greater than the obvious weaknesses connected with the most-favored-nation reciprocity policy.
> Senator VANDENBERG. But in a world which is distressed with all of these other artificial interferences, which both of us agree exist to a tremendous degree at the present time, and constantly multiplying, in that kind of a world—first, a world at war, and second, a world facing a subsequent readjustment which will be bitterly competitive—in that kind of a world, it seems to me, that when we pursue the unconditional most-favored-nation policy, we are just bound to get the worst of it.

Yesterday the distinguished Senator from Michigan said "we would lose our shirts."

Continuing his own language in the hearings—

> We are the ones who maintain the ideal which you speak, and the other fellow takes our shirt.

Even in the hearings the Senator from Michigan had discovered that we were about "to lose our shirts."

Mr. Rogers replied:

> If we abandon the principle of equality, which is the word meant by the most-favored-nation clause—if we abandon the principle of equality and proceed to strike special bargains with any country you please, country A at the present moment, our whole structure of economics, international economics, falls in a moment.

I will not read further, but I think Mr. Rogers' statement in the hearings is a rather satisfactory reply to the argument advanced by the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. President, I have not dealt with the merits of the trade agreements concluded under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. I regret that I did not have the opportunity to devote myself exclusively to that side of the question. I will not now attempt to go into it, beyond the statement that when the war period to which the distinguished Senator from Michigan yesterday referred shall have passed and the world is again attempting to make necessary readjustments, unquestionably international trade relations will be much out of joint; and even before peace shall finally come it is imperative, in my judgment, to retain the only instrumentality, the Trade Agreements Act, under which we can make necessary adjustments even in the twenty-odd trade agreements which have been negotiated and are now in operation between this country and other countries.

It may be that in the rapidly changing circumstances of the time it will become vitally necessary to supplement the agreements already in existence by other agreements in order to protect our interests. If the Trade Agreements Act shall expire, then not only will there be no machinery under which that process can be carried forward but there will be no law which will authorize our Government to attempt to protect itself even against the existing trade agreements which so many distinguished Members of the Senate seem to fear are working great injury to our trade, to our commerce, and to our own domestic affairs.

Mr. President, when the history of the time between 1934 and this hour shall be written coolly and deliberately, it will be found, I dare say, that the Trade Agreements Act advanced by that able and patient and devoted statesman, the distinguished Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, and energetically supported by the President of the United States, is the only step taken by any great commercial nation during this hectic period looking to the readjustment of trade and commerce between the nations of the earth on anything like an equitable basis that would give us such a flow and volume of commerce, without injury to our own industry and to our own standards, as to make possible a tolerable condition in the commercial relations of the great industrial and commercial countries of the globe.

Mr. AUSTIN obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am glad I have had the opportunity to listen to all the distinguished debate by the great Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], for whose opinion I have the utmost respect, not only on account of his great background of legal learning and natural ability, but also because I have found him, in my brief service in the United States Senate, to be a very fair, judicial statesman, who brings to the discussion of our problems here an unusually candid and nonpartison consideration. I think that from his point of view—that is, upon the consideration of powers which I call subordinate powers—his argument is an excellent one. If I could start with the assumption he makes, and add it to my characterization of the powers which he describes, I could follow him. The great difficulty which I encounter at the outset is that I believe the Senate now is concerned not with subordinate powers but with dominant powers—powers not created by any Congress or any parliament on earth. They are the vital, the paramount, the essential things which constitute sovereignty, and they came to the people of the United States because sovereignty never dies. They were not endowed upon the people of the United States. They were never granted to the Federal Government by the States. The powers with which we are dealing today are powers superior to any form of law. They descended to us as a living thing when we cut off our relations with our forefathers across the sea.

We gained no powers by revolution. Our successful revolution merely continued sovereignty which theretofore had existed on this continent in the person of the King, and at that particular time a tyrant, George III.

To me this is one of the most interesting periods of my experience as a United States Senator. I think no more important question has ever engaged my interest than the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. If these undertakings made between the United States and foreign lands are treaties, we have no choice at all, it is not for us to say by statute whether we will or will not ratify them. Why? Because when it devolved upon the people of this country, at the successful termination of the revolution, to administer sovereignty, the people said, "There are certain powers of sovereignty which we will restrict in their operation. We will say that this tyrannical exercise of sovereignty shall never again be possible, for we will divide up the sovereign powers so that no one man and no one department of government can exercise them all."

We were especially careful about sovereignty which concerned the vital matter of foreign relations. We hedged that around by unusual and extraordinary limitations and safeguards. We put two checks on that power. We provided that the Congress should not meddle in the negotiation of our foreign arrangements. We gave the Executive of the United States of America that part of sovereignty which concerned itself with day to day relations with foreign countries, and we did not allow any other department of the Government to interfere with the negotiation of our relations with our neighbors in the world.

The President of the United States has the exclusive authority to negotiate treaties, but when it comes to the consummation of an agreement between another nation and our Nation, having to do with substantial and dominant affairs vital to the life and sovereignty of this Nation, then there is a check upon the transaction at once, and the Senate of the United States is called into the transaction and brought to the table, and it is only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate that treaties are made. They must be negotiated by the President, and they must be made by the President and Senate combined. Why? Because the sovereigns—that is, the people of the United States—considered so important this matter of their relations to Great Britain, a former enemy, and to all other nations which are foreign, that they must secure and safeguard their liberty from destruction by the interference of foreign domination, foreign "isms," foreign influence, foreign power, foreign economics, foreign religion, foreign philosophy, and everything else that was foreign. The life of the Republic as it was viewed then, and as I view it now, depended upon this safeguard, that every individual in the United States shall have representation, through the Senators here assembled under the Constitution, upon the conclusion of an agreement with a foreign country relating to a measure of great public interest, a primary right, a dominant power of the United States.

Why did they say that the Senate should confirm treaties, and that the House should originate legislation which would levy taxes? Obviously these two powers were hitched up in such a way that they could work only if they worked in harmony, but always separately as to the origin of the legislation which affected vitally the liberty and perhaps the safety of the people of this country.

Mr. President, it is the recognition of that difference which constitutes the reason involved here. We say that if these arrangements constitute treaties, then these arrangements are void and invalid unless they have the ratification of the Senate, and there is not a man within the sound of my voice who will deny that. And why? Because it is written? No. Because it is reason. It is because everyone recognizes the fundamental necessity of safeguarding affairs so transcendent as international contracts, to run for a period of time, affecting the public welfare against the possibility of error or of fraud, or of any of those adventitious circumstances which might injuriously affect the result of the exercise of this great and dominant power by one single department of the Government of the United States.

So we have this postulate—and it is something for which I have searched the reports on this legislation and failed to find; it is something I have hearkened for throughout all these debates and failed to hear—that we cannot avoid recognition of the distinction between dominant and subordinate powers when we are handling this amendment, and if we conclude that we are dealing with dominant powers our duty is marked out; there is no evading it.

Choose whichever we wish, ultimately that duty will be effectuated in some way. That duty is that when it comes to a dominant power Congress may not delegate it at all. What is the use talking about yardsticks and standards when we are dealing with a primary power, with several primary powers, as a matter of fact—legislation, taxation, commerce between foreign nations and ourselves, and treaty making. Mention the last, and we know we have named the most important and vital and essentially sovereign power of the American form of government, and we know that is so because of the effect of treaties upon the life and welfare of the Nation.

Montesquieu said that reason is the spirit of the law, that if there be no reason, there is no law. So, Mr. President, that is our situation now in determining whether these are treaties. Who will challenge Vattel as an authority on international law? Who will question the extracts from Vattel quoted by the distinguished Senator from Georgia?

They speak with a venerable soundness which will endure throughout all time, and the recognition of the fact that we may have agreements between nations will not be disputed.

All history shows that mankind depends on agreements between nations not having the dignity or the formality of treaties, to carry on certain transactions which are as clearly marked as the importance of their object makes them.

Senators will remember this definition by Vattel, which has already been referred to. This was in section 153:

> The compacts which have temporary matters for their object are called agreements, conventions, and pactions. They are accomplished by one single act, and not by repeated acts. These compacts are affected in their execution once for all. Treaties receive a successive execution whose duration equals that of the treaty.

Time, therefore, of the effect of the engagement has something to do with the determination of whether that which we enter into is a treaty or a contract. But time is not the only element. All the circumstances surrounding the transaction, especially the effect of the transaction or the contemplated effect of the transaction upon life, upon the public good, these also must be taken into account in considering whether the engagement constitutes a mere agreement or a treaty.

Mr. President, is it because the act itself calls them agreements that we must treat them as agreements? Let me ask to apply all that has been said by the learned Senator from Georgia to the case, if we were to change the word and describe in the act the instruments as "treaties." He would reply, I am sure, "I would not say what I have said as to treaties. I know what I have said as to treaties is fundamentally wrong because I know that treaties must be ratified by the Senate."

I quote from the act of 1930 this small extract:

> Is authorized from time to time—
> (1) To enter into foreign-trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof.

Now change that to read:

> To enter into foreign-trade treaties with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof.

Would we thus make the engagements authorized by the act treaties? Oh no, Mr. President, we must do something more than hitch a label to these transactions. We must look into the act and see what the scope of the power is, what is contemplated to be done by the President to whom we delegate the power to make these arrangements in order to ascertain whether or not they are treaties. That is a fundamental principle which ought not to require citation, but, since there has been a very full support in decisions for all that has occurred here, I shall call attention to the following from a very early case, that of Wayman et al. against Southard et al., in which Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the Court. After stating the case, he says:

> It will not be contended that Congress can delegate to the courts, or to any other tribunals, powers which are strictly and exclusively legislative.

And again at another place:

> The line has not been exactly drawn which separates those important subjects, which must be entirely regulated by the legislature itself, from those of less interest, in which a general provision may be made, and power given to those who are to act under such general provisions to fill up the details.

There is an interpretation of our form of government by one of the greatest jurists this country has ever known, a man who specialized in government, and who is attributed to have had tremendous influence upon the molding of our form of government through his remarkably constructive interpretations of the Constitution. There is the postulate. The line has not been exactly drawn between those primary functions which Congress alone may exercise, and those subordinate functions which may be delegated to some other department of the Government to perform for the Congress. There is the early recognition of something that will be found running like a golden thread through all the jurisprudence of this country from that time to this, so axiomatic that scarcely ever will it be found reproduced in exactly the same language that appears there.

Comment on it was made in the case of United States v. Grimaud (55 L. Ed., pp. 563, 567), from which I read an extract. This was an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Lamar:

> It must be admitted that it is difficult to define the line which separates legislative power to make laws from administrative authority to make regulations. This difficulty has often been recognized, and was referred to by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in Wayman v. Southard, * * * where he was considering the authority of courts to make rules. He there said: "It will not be contended that Congress can delegate to the courts, or to any other tribunals, powers which are strictly and exclusively legislative. But Congress may certainly delegate to others powers which the legislature may rightfully exercise itself." What were these nonlegislative powers which Congress could exercise, but which might also be delegated to others, was not determined, for he said: "The line has not been exactly drawn which separates those important subjects, which must be entirely regulated by the legislature itself, from those of less interest, in which a general provision may be made, and power given to those who are to act under those general provisions to fill up the details.

The same opinion cites Marshall Field & Co. against Clark, a case which is constantly referred to with misapplication, as I believe, a case that will not apply unless it is applied to the delegation of a subordinate power. As I conceive it, this decision relates to the delegation of a legislative act and not to the delegation of the power to make a treaty. But I think Senators will see the application to the case before us now. I read from this language. Again he said:

> In Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark: * * * The legislature cannot delegate its powers to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes or intends to make its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which cannot be known to the lawmaking power and must therefore be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.

Again at another place he quotes as follows:

> That Congress cannot delegate legislative power is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution.

Mr. President, it is apparent that every time one tests a proposal to ascertain whether or not it contains the delegation of a primary or dominant power he must consider the proposed legislation and see what its probable effect is. Upon what does it intrude—if it intrudes at all—that belongs exclusively to the Congress because of its importance? So I take the Tariff Act of 1930 and point out that, in the first place, it takes something away from Congress. Can an act of Congress give away or completely invalidate a power of Congress? Think that over. Power arises not from what we do. We do not lift ourselves by our own boot straps. If we have power, we take it from the people, from the source of sovereignty.

I am sure we are ready to admit that treaty making is a power of which we cannot divest ourselves. Treaty making, we are confident, is something that the President cannot do alone. Yet by this act we say that the duration of the so-called agreements shall be 3 years and 6 months from the date of making them. Ah, but the time is longer than that, because we also say that the rate of duty applied to each and every article shall be extended in its effect to articles from all countries on earth—not merely the unconditionally most-favored nations and the conditionally favored nations, but all nations. Can we do that? Let us see. I quote:

> The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly.

Then we added the following provisions, which amplified what we meant by such duties:

> As used in this section, the term "duties and other import restrictions" includes (1) rate and form of import duties and classification of articles; and (2) limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions, other than duties, imposed on importation or imposed for the regulation of imports.

Having done that, what about the 3 years and 6 months? When do we come to the end of the obligation which as a country we have made? Is this a temporary arrangement? We see that by the overlapping which we ourselves make in the act the time involved in which we have divested ourselves of the right to legislate upon duties and import restrictions, rates and forms of import duties, classification of articles, limitations, prohibitions, charges and exactions other than duties, extends to 3 years and 6 months after the date of the last treaty which the United States makes by virtue of the act.

Ah, there is the test! Is it a fundamental power? Is it a primary power? Is it a dominant power? Is it an element of sovereignty that Congress shall legislate with respect to duties and imposts?

Mr. President, the answer is clear. The Constitution of the United States made that matter a primary obligation of the Congress. Not only that, the people hedged that power still further by saying that that kind of legislation shall originate only in one place in the Congress—namely, the House of Representatives, which is always as close to the people as within 2 years of an election. The people said, "We will so tie down this power that we can within 2 years control the purse strings ourselves by changing entirely the personnel of the body which must originate the legislation imposing these duties."

Is that a primary power? Can anyone conceive of anything more essential and vital to sovereignty than the matter of raising revenue or of using duties, imposts, and excises as a means of regulating international trade? What difference does it make whether or not the purpose is to restrict international competition? If we step into that category of powers, namely, the power to levy taxes and imposts, then we can start only in one place with the legislation, and that is in the House of Representatives. Is that a power involved in the act and undertaken to be transmitted to the President? Who can deny it? The act gives the President power "to proclaim such modification of existing duties"—section 350 (a) (2). By making one contract he suspends that power for us for 3 years and 6 months. By making a contract near the end of the time he extends the suspension for 6 years, and so forth. It is absurd; it is ridiculous; it is against reason to claim that the scope of the delegation attempted does not include dominant, essential, vital powers of sovereignty.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Would the Senator consider it a delegation of power or an abdication of power?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think it is an attempt to delegate power. It is hardly an abdication, because when we passed the act the assumption was that it was an emergency act, temporary in its nature, and limited in its time. It will be remembered that one section said:

> The authority of the President to enter into foreign-trade agreements under section 1 of this act shall terminate on the expiration of 3 years from the date of the enactment of this act.

So it was not intended to be an abdication. We can scarcely abdicate. I cannot bring myself to admit it anyway. The act was undertaken specifically as an emergency measure, and if the Senator will be patient a moment I shall read what Secretary Hull said about that element when testifying before the Finance Committee of the Senate on April 27, 1934:

> With due respect to this opposing view, it is my judgment that extraordinary conditions call for extraordinary methods of treatment, and that the proposed measure of relief is urgently needed at this time.

Again he said:

> If the exigency requiring the proposed reciprocity trade agreements did not call for reasonably prompt action in many instances, the special and temporary authority asked for would naturally not be sought.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. What I am trying to get through my mind is this: If we are to consider trade agreements as treaties, we cannot delegate the power to the Executive, because he already has the power to negotiate treaties. But if we were to have nothing to say with reference to ratifying treaties, would we not be abdicating a power which Congress has over that particular subject?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am certain that if the word is applied in a limited way, that is true. For the time being we divest ourselves of the power to legislate on all the subjects comprehended, including the regulation of international commerce and trade, the levying of excise taxes, and so forth. It will be recalled that the levying of excise taxes is involved. Let me say in passing that that is an internal interference of grave importance. Of course, the fundamental function of entering into treaties with foreign nations is involved. All these things are involved in this delegation.

There is one other thing that is very strange, that by the express terms of the act of 1934 we enabled the President of the United States by what we called an agreement to terminate other treaties. Here it is:

> (b) Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the application, with respect to rates of duty established under this section pursuant to agreements with countries other than Cuba, of the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity, concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on December 11, 1902, or to preclude giving effect to an exclusive agreement with Cuba, concluded under this section, modifying the existing preferential customs treatment of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of Cuba.

We do not have to debate, do we, that under the Constitution and the doctrine of inherent sovereignty, the President of the United States, even though he does have the right to negotiate treaties, has not the right to denounce them, amend them, or modify or change them? Congress alone may do that, either through that form of legislation which we all dislike, namely, by treaties duly entered into, negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate, or by denunciation of the treaty by an act of Congress of both Houses. There is no doubt about it. Then, why question, for a moment, the necessity of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]? We must have it because trade agreements are treaties; they are treaties because they involve the exercise of dominant power. They involve the exercise of sovereignty in its highest form. That is why they are treaties, and that is the real reason and sense of it; that is the spirit of the law. Since these are matters that affect the very life and vitality of nationality and the position of the country in the world, since they are that, they require the exercise of the checks and balances which the people placed upon their exercise.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the able Senator from Vermont take the position that the reciprocal-trade agreements are treaties in the true sense of the word?

Mr. AUSTIN. Truly.

Mr. LUCAS. May I ask the Senator this hypothetical question: Assuming that the Senator's views upon that point are in error, and that instead of treaties they are international compacts or executive agreements, as is contended by a number of Senators on the floor, would the Senator say that there are sufficient safeguards or sufficient standards or an intelligible principle written into the legislation which would take care of the delegation of power?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am glad to answer that question candidly. I would answer it with the one word "No," but I should like to explain my answer. The standards are withdrawn by express legislation in the act. There were standards, and those standards were not repealed; they still exist as section 336 of the Revenue Act of 1930. Those standards are still the law, and they are quite exact. In a general way, they are covered by the reference to the equalization of costs of production, but that in nowise adequately expresses the detail of standardization contained in section 336. All the minute characteristics which must be taken into account in ascertaining the differences in cost of production at home and abroad are set forth in the law. Very well. That is the law today. No effort has been made to repeal it. Here it is. I now read from the act whose temporary term is to be extended:

SEC. 2. (a) Subparagraph (d) of paragraph 369, the last sentence of paragraph 1402, and the provisos to paragraphs 371, 401, 1650, 1687, and 1803 (1) of the Tariff Act of 1930 are repealed.

Now, we come to the action taken on the Trade Agreement Act with respect to section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930:

The provisions of sections 336 and 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall not apply to any article with respect to the importation of which into the United States a foreign trade agreement has been concluded pursuant to this act, or to any provision of any such agreement.

Where must we look to find out whether there has been laid down a standard to guide an administrative body? If it is assumed it is a minor matter with which we are dealing, and that it does not affect a vital element of our national life, what do we look to? To nothing more than the act. Then, where do we find any standard in the act? We find that the act prescribes the time when the President may start negotiations for an agreement; we can find the purpose for which he is to enter into an agreement; but we cannot find a single standard upon which the (1) rate and form of import duties and classification of articles, and (2) limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties imposed on importation or imposed for the regulation of imports can be based.

I am willing to say in passing that outside the fundamental questions involved here, which I regard as vital and as timely for discussion, the matter of detail contained in the several treaties is of little importance; for the conditions in the world have entirely upset old standards, and there is no agreement that can be entered into today that will fend off the exigencies of war, such as quota importations and other restrictions, exchange blocs, and all those things that interfere with the normal flow of trade and commerce. So I say that notwithstanding its unimportance, and notwithstanding that any rule we might have applied, such as the rule which I know many persons think is the only one that would apply now—namely, that the standard shall be the difference between landed costs and costs of production here—it would not be of much value today; and who could foresee for 6 months the events which might change the rate now fixed under such a standard? But there is no standard here.

I had a letter this morning showing how important this matter seems to be to an agricultural segment of our population. The letter is from the American Farm Bureau Federation. In an official resolution they have urged that no trade agreements be consummated without the approval of the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Agriculture. There is nothing in the act to satisfy them. The act says that the purpose of these treaties shall be to expand foreign markets—for the products of the United States * * * by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States.

That is a noble objective. Probably it is the same objective that is considered by the federation in its letter to me this morning; but there is no way that is laid out, not even a vague way, not even a general rule laid down, that shall be followed by the President in fixing the rates of these duties, and in fixing the limitations, prohibitions, charges, and other exactions.

Mr. President, it will be observed that in discussing this matter I have treated the abolition of the standard as a part of the evidence showing the importance or magnitude of the function we are trying to delegate. We show that what we are trying to turn over to the President is the whole legislative power. To him is the discretion. If, in his judgment, he can attain the objectives named in the act, if he can serve the purpose named in the act, then, when a certain event occurs, he may start his treaty negotiation.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, a further examination of this act shows that another repeal of importance in determining whether these are treaties or agreements occurs in the act; namely, section 516 (b); that is, it is a repeal for the time being. It may be said that it is a suspension. At any rate, it makes not to apply one of the vital rights, one of the important privileges of the American citizen, and that is the privilege of appeal.

We so far valued justice in our system that we provided that when a citizen is in conflict with his Government, the distribution of powers shall be such that no injustice shall occur through tyranny of the Government. So we said: If we have an administrative body or an officer out on the borders representing the United States, and he begins to mistreat our people by putting wrong classifications upon our importations, by exacting too great duties, by applying to us embargoes or quotas or any import restrictions that ought not to be applied, we do not have to bow down abjectly and suffer. We have an appeal to a judicial body which will protect the rights of the citizen and give him a hearing.

Mr. President, that is true with respect to all articles in the United States today excepting those articles which come under the trade agreements. As to them the appeal is suspended. Why? It must have been foreseen that we were doing an exceedingly strange thing, in the first place, in letting a foreign country have something to do with fixing a rate of duty on goods which we import, in other words, letting our President deal with a ruler across the seas to find out how much our tariff duties shall be and what import restrictions shall be laid down here to protect our farmers and our workmen, and then allow an appeal to a judicial body in the United States where freedom exists and where justice is administered. That could not be done. That is confounding confusion. No; if we are going part of the way, and let Russia or Germany or any other foreign nation, no matter under what conditions of servitude their workmen are laboring, to step in here and negotiate with the President of the United States on the rates of customs duties and on the conditions of importation we shall put up as a barrier against their competition, we might as well go the whole way and make it thoroughly tyrannical in its aspects. We will remove the right of appeal. So we said: The provisions of section 336 and 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall not apply to any article with respect to the importation of which into the United States a foreign trade agreement has been concluded pursuant to this act or to any provision of any such agreement.

Mr. President, that was the American characteristic of the Tariff Act of 1930, the right to go to a sanctuary when one is in trouble with his Government, the setting up of a place where one might find justice and not be dependent solely on the fiat of the President of the United States. Is it important or is it subordinate? I have not begun to cover all the details of the exercise of primary functions of government which are involved by this act in our international relations which may be determined under it by the President of the United States alone.

Mr. President, the question of the primary importance of the power that is attempted to be delegated, the clear-cut test of whether these are treaties or not treaties, is repeatedly referred to with respect to all kinds of attempts at delegation of authority. It is not limited to treaty making and the regulation of commerce, whether interstate or international, is not free from the limitation. That, too, is a vital power, and has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States not to be subject to delegation except as to those subordinate actions which are governed by a general rule laid down by the Congress.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to two or three references which show how the Supreme Court constantly keeps in mind the distinction between vital powers and incidental powers, dominant powers and inferior powers, general powers and the mere filling in of details.

I shall first read from the case of Bromley v. The Collector of Internal Revenue, McCaughn (280 U. S. 124, p. 137). That case had to do with taxation, as taxation is involved in the measure before the Senate, for the power to tinker with excise taxes, to fix them at the rate they now bear, to promise not to levy them in the future, all such powers are expressly contained in the delegation under the Trade Agreements Act; and no man lives who can say with any probity that that is not taxation. In the Bromley case the Court said:

> So far as the constitutional power to tax is concerned, it would be difficult to state any intelligible distinction, founded either in reason or upon practical consideration of weight, between a tax upon the exercise of the power to give property inter vivos and the disposition of it by legacy, upheld in Knowlton v. Moore, supra, the succession tax in Scholey v. Rew, supra, the tax upon the manufacture and sale of colored oleomargarine in McCray v. United States, supra, the tax upon sales of grain upon an exchange in Nicol v. Ames, supra, the tax upon sales of shares of stock in Thomas v. United States, supra, the tax upon the use of foreign-built yachts in Billings v. United States, supra, the tax upon the use of carriages in Hylton v. United States, supra; compare Veazie Bank v. Fenno, supra, 545; Thomas v. United States, supra, 370.
> It is true that in each of these cases the tax was imposed upon the exercise of one of the numerous rights of property, but each is clearly distinguishable from a tax which falls upon the owner merely because he is the owner, regardless of the use or disposition made of his property (see Billings v. United States, supra; cf. Pierce v. United States (232 U. S. 290)).
> The persistence of this distinction and the justification for it rest upon the historic fact that taxes of this type were not understood to be direct taxes when the Constitution was adopted and, as well, upon the reluctance of this Court to enlarge by construction, limitations upon the sovereign power of taxation by article I, section 8, so vital to the maintenance of the National Government. Nicol v. Ames, supra, 514, 515.

Mr. President, that citation is a good witness of the vital character of the power to tax with which we are asked to tinker now, and which we are asked to delegate to the President of the United States for another 3 years, under a statute which we were told was solely an emergency measure, intended to be terminated within 3 years, and which would have been wholly uncalled for except for the conditions of the emergency which existed at the time the act was passed.

Chief Justice Hughes, in the "gold clause" cases, made a reference to this recognition of primary power in the following manner:

> But the right to make binding obligations is a competence attaching to sovereignty. In the United States sovereignty resides in the people who act through the organs established by the Constitution.

That is what I have been trying to emphasize.

> The Congress as the instrumentality of sovereignty is endowed with certain powers to be exerted on behalf of the people in the manner and with the effect the Constitution ordains. The Congress cannot invoke the sovereign power of the people to override their will as thus declared. The powers conferred upon the Congress are harmonious. The Constitution gives to the Congress the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States—

See how this power is described:

> an unqualified power, a power vital to the Government, upon which in an extremity its very life may depend. * * * The Congress has not been vested with authority to alter or destroy those obligations * * *.

In the last sentences quoted the Court recognized what constitutes a vital power, a dominant power, a primary power, such as those contained in the scope of the Trade Agreements Act of 1934, delegating to the President of the United States the sole power to extinguish laws in existence, to make treaties with foreign nations so that laws that still existed should not apply; to change the rates of duties, and to levy excise taxes; to promise not to tax, and have this promise last for years, thus divesting Congress of the power to tax during all that time.

How absurd to treat those powers as if they were such subordinate things as we have heard referred to in the debate, such subordinate powers as the power reposed in the Interstate Commerce Commission to require railroads to keep accounts in the manner specified, or to fix in interstate commerce rates of transportation which are just and reasonable; the power of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make regulations pertaining to sale of unbranded oleomargarine; the power of the Federal Reserve Board to permit national banks to act as trustees; the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend rates as to car service. Are these powers vital to the life of the country? Ah, no. We know the difference. We know the difference, not alone because that difference is expressed in the fundamental law, although that ought to teach it to us, for we take an oath to support that law, but we recognize that difference because it is founded in reason. And parties may not, cannot, remove their transactions from the reach of dominant constitutional power simply by making contracts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As the Senator knows, I have great respect for his views. I want to ask him a question. Is it the Senator's argument that the only way the power which the Congress has to regulate commerce—which to my mind is full and plenary—can be exercised is by means of tariff laws?

Mr. AUSTIN. I assume that the Senator's question relates to international commerce.

Mr. McKELLAR. To international commerce. The Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign countries. Is the Senator of the view that it can only regulate it by passing what is known in the ordinary parlance as a tariff law, and it cannot go beyond that?

Mr. AUSTIN. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would the Senator elaborate on that idea, as to how the power should be exercised other than by a tariff law?

Mr. AUSTIN. We exercised it in the last extraordinary session of Congress, did we not? We said to all the world "We are willing to make one of the greatest sacrifices any nation has ever made with respect to its commerce, and we will withdraw from the sea lanes our ships that are in danger, and we will not allow a single article which is American, of great or of little value, to get into that zone of trouble."

In other words, there is a way in which we can regulate international commerce by imposing restrictions upon our nationals. Very well. That is only one way. If we find that the civilization of the world has broken down, that wars have devastated property and caused the death of many human beings, and diet is so limited, clothing so poor, shelter of agricultural producers and factory workers and miners and employees of the mills so abject, and their needs so great that when they come to our shores with a competitive product they offer it at a price that takes away from the products of our own laborers and producers of agricultural products their natural market, then we can regulate that commerce. We can do it in a number of ways.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps I did not express my question clearly. What I meant to ask was, Is it the Senator's idea that we can pass a tariff law under the constitutional provision, fixing rates, but we cannot give to the President or to any agency which we may establish, the power to regulate those rates further by reducing them or increasing them?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I have not made that claim. Of course, I am aware of the flexible features of the Tariff Act of 1930, by which we said to the President of the United States, "You may raise and lower within certain limitations, provided a fact-finding body of experts finds certain facts." Then we laid down four or five pages of facts he must find in order to take action. In other words, Congress did the legislating and the Tariff Commission and the President did the executing, which is a perfectly normal American act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in a modified way, is that not exactly what is proposed in the Trade Agreements Act?

Mr. AUSTIN. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is just a trifle different way of handling it, but in essence and in fact is it not the same thing?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have heard the learned Senator assert his views on that subject, and his question implies that he thinks it is, but I differ. My view is that the act does not contain any general rule; it does not contain even the vaguest of standards. It has no legislative direction in it. It merely states a purpose, and a time when these powers may be exercised, but it does not tell how they shall be exercised, nor does it tell upon what set of circumstances the tariff duties shall be laid down. The power the Senator referred to is a mere beginning of the list of powers contained in this attempt at delegation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Perhaps this is not quite germane to the point which the Senator is now discussing, but it seems to me, if the Senator will pardon me, that the obligation rests upon Congress whenever it is dealing with legislation, to remember the fact that our Government was formed, I may say, as a sort of a protest against the assertion of power by an Executive, and in the provisions of the Constitution of the United States our fathers were determined to bind the authorities, to bind the hand of the Executive, and to point out, with proper limitations, and with sufficient clarity, the duties and responsibilities of the tripartite organizations which were set up, namely, the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary.

The fathers had in mind the fact that the great abuses which had resulted in the Revolution, and in the achievement of the independence of the Colonies, grew out of the tyranny of the king, and they determined more than anything else to limit the authority of the Executive.

Therefore, they said that the Congress should have the power to deal with questions of taxation, and with revenue, and with the numerous other questions. It would seem to me that the first thing to which we should address ourselves in the consideration of the legislation is, Are we impinging upon the concept of the fathers when they said that the Executive shall have no power except that which is specifically granted, and that the residue of the power is reserved to the other branches of the Government and to the people themselves?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the learned Senator from Utah always contributes something to thought that is worth considering seriously. I am very glad that he has taken the trouble to interpolate these fundamental ideas, for really we are not dealing with precedents here. This is a matter of principle. It rests very largely upon our reasoning. If we cannot see the difference between those acts which are necessary to be kept safeguarded and protected from usurpation or delegation or abdication—if we cannot reason that out for ourselves, then perhaps we are entirely wrong in the assumption that there are any such powers.

The Senator from Utah has laid his finger on something which we recognize, and that is that away back behind the Magna Carta, and of course, therefore, before the separation of authority by our Constitution, three fundamental principles were recognized by our British ancestors, principles which go back so far that no man knows when they did not exist. Those three fundamental principles were: First, that the King could not legislate without the consent of Parliament; second, that he could impose no tax without the consent of Parliament; and third, that he was bound to conduct the executive administration according to the laws of the land. Sometimes a king lost his head when he violated those principles. The people on this continent rebelled and revolted against the tyranny represented by the violation of those principles. Our existence as a nation depended upon the affirmation of those principles. What are we, and who are we, voluntarily to surrender them?

Mr. President, I realize that I have taken much time in very imperfectly presenting my views; but I feel that this is one of the most important issues which I have considered since I came to the Senate. In the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]—a simple, short amendment requiring that hereafter any agreement entered into under the provisions of the act must be brought back to the Senate for advice and consent before it shall become effective—is wrapped up the safety of the Republic. The great, fundamental acts of sovereignty are all comprehended in the power of negotiating contracts with Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Russia, and other countries—contracts which involve imposts, excises, customs duties, and limitations on commerce, and also involve legislation by us, namely, the legislation ordinarily found necessary for levying excise taxes within the United States. These are all tied up in the joint resolution to extend the power of the President to exercise these great sovereign powers for another 3 years. With my views I cannot conscientiously sit silent and allow the joint resolution to come to a vote without first registering a very strong feeling, a very firm persuasion, that we are about to do something which affects the very life of the Republic.

Mr. President, I desire to supplement in the RECORD some of the citations I have made, particularly bearing upon the theory that the regulation of commerce cannot be delegated by Congress except in respect of minor or subordinate particulars.

In this connection I quote from a letter written by Judge Thomas D. Thacher, former Solicitor General of the United States, to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 25, 1935, as follows:

> In Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan (293 U. S. 388), and in A. L. Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States (55 Sup. Ct., 837), the Supreme Court of the United States has recently declared section 9 and section 3 of the National Industrial Recovery Act invalid because of the unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the President; and the Court has twice declared:
> This is a quotation:
> Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President to exercise an unfettered discretion to make whatever laws he thinks may be needed or advisable for the rehabilitation and expansion of trade or industry.

In other words, merely because it is a matter of trade or industry does not take it out of the realm of what is vitally important to our sovereignty.

I should like to have permission to insert what follows, as it has been marked by me in the quotation from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of a former session, volume 79, June 25, 1935. A portion of the quotation I should like to say illustrates the difference between a primary power such as that which is attempted here to be delegated and those subordinate powers which the Court has passed on and said are proper to delegate.

I ask leave to insert at this point a list of citations from cases in which the Court has held such delegation of subordinate powers to be proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Vermont is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the letter of Judge Thacher to Senator VANDENBERG, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 25, 1935]

Upon the principles laid down in the oil and poultry cases, the act clearly appears to be an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the President. It is necessary, however, to consider legislation of Congress which has in the past delegated to the President the power to suspend, increase, and decrease customs duties. A summary of this legislation appears in Norwegian Nitrogen Co. v. United States (288 U. S. 294, at pp. 308–309). Such legislation was under consideration by the Supreme Court in Hampton & Co. v. United States (276 U. S. 394) and Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649) and while in each of these cases the particular delegation of power was sustained as constitutional, the principles upon which such delegations of power must be tested were fully developed and defined by the Court, and these principles controlled decision in the oil and poultry cases.

[From CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 25, 1935, p. 10440]

Bromley v. McCaughn (280 U. S. 124) and the authorities cited by Justice Stone in that case establish the validity of the proposed tax. As Justice Stone said in the Bromley case, "while taxes levied upon or collected from persons because of their general ownership of property may be taken to be direct, this Court has consistently held, almost from the foundation of the Government, that a tax imposed upon a particular use of property or the exercise of a single power of property incidental to ownership is an excise which need not be apportioned." Since taxes on the right to give property (Bromley v. McCaughn, supra) to dispose of property by legacy (Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41), to manufacture and sell colored oleomargarine (McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27), to sell grain upon a commodity exchange (Nicol v. Ames, 173 U. S. 509), to sell shares of stock (Thomas v. United States, 192 U. S. 363), to use foreign-built yachts (Billings v. United States, 232 U. S. 261), to use carriages (Hylton v. United State, 3 Dall. 171), to use certain manufactured articles (sec. 622, Revenue Act of 1932), to process agricultural commodities (sec. 9, Agricultural Adjustment Act) are valid excises, certainly there can be no doubt of the validity of an excise tax imposed upon the owner of furs for the privilege of dressing and dyeing them or having them dressed and dyed for him by another.

Mr. CAPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am opposing the extension, through the joint resolution now pending, of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, unless the resolution is amended to require ratification by the Senate of any such agreement before it becomes effective.

I am in favor of increasing our foreign trade, and I favor a general lowering of tariff barriers and the removal or mitigation of other trade barriers in order to attain that objective.

It is not necessary for anyone from the State Department or from a college faculty to shout at me that we cannot hope to sell abroad unless we also buy from abroad. I learned long ago that foreign trade, and also domestic trade, means the exchange of goods and services, not just the sale of commodities.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the United States negotiating and making effective reciprocal trade agreements to attain this worth-while objective.

But I am not willing to sacrifice the American farmer, nor to endanger our form of government, by the kind of futile efforts which have been put forth during the past 5½ years under the present act.

Mr. President, no section of the country is more interested in building up our foreign trade than my own, unless it is the Cotton Belt.

No group of people in our Nation is more vitally interested in restoring foreign trade than are the producers of those surplus crops—wheat, cotton, corn, hogs, tobacco, rice.

We in the Wheat Belt know, as do those in the Cotton Belt, that unless we can regain and retain our foreign markets or a good percentage of the foreign markets for our production, that production must be seriously curtailed for many years to come.

Six years ago, Mr. President, I shut my eyes to the constitutional question involved in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. In spite of grave misgivings because of the fact that the Senate was surrendering a measure of its control over the treaty-making powers granted by the Constitution; in spite of the fact that the Congress was surrendering its power over the purse strings—the taxing power—to the Executive, I voted for the enactment of the original Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

I have lived to regret that action.

I had hoped, and the farmers of the country had hoped, that the State Department and the President would use the legislative powers thus vested in them to increase the markets abroad for our surplus farm commodities.

Those hopes have not been realized. On the contrary, the power to lower tariff duties has been used to permit—yes, to encourage—imports of farm commodities of which we ourselves produce surpluses. Under this policy the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation buys surplus farm products for distribution among relief clients, while at the same time we encourage the importation of additional quantities of such commodities in larger amounts than the Surplus Commodities Corporation buys.

At the same time the State Department encourages and makes possible increased importations of farm commodities which are produced in the United States, the Department of Agriculture pays our farmers for reducing production of farm commodities.

In effect, through the State Department we subsidize farmers of foreign lands to produce more for the American market, while through the Department of Agriculture we subsidize the American farmer to produce less for the American market and to throw away what foreign market he had left.

Mr. President, the American farmer was sacrificed for the benefit of the manufacturing industry during the years we wrote higher and higher tariffs.

That policy was wrong, as we have learned to our sorrow. In the long run I do not believe the manufacturing industry has gained by it, although many individuals in that business have.

But now, what are we doing, through these reciprocal trade agreements, to correct the wrong that was done the farmer by the high protective tariff system.

Mr. President, we are again sacrificing the American farmer for the benefit of the American manufacturer—and the foreign farmer.

The farmer paid the price of high tariffs.

Now he is to pay the price of lowering those high tariffs.

Under higher and higher tariffs the American farmer was penalized so that the American manufacturer could build up his domestic market.

Now farm tariffs are being lowered so that the American manufacturer can build up his foreign market.

I say that is wrong. More than that, it is, in the long run, an unsound public policy, one that will hurt industry as well as agriculture.

Six years ago we were promised—at least that was my understanding—two things:

First. That the reciprocal trade agreements negotiated would result in increased markets for the farmer. Naturally, I took that to mean, as I believe the American farmers took it to mean, that there would be increased foreign markets for the export of American farm products. We certainly did not understand it to mean that there were to be increased American markets for the production of the farmers of other lands.

Second. We were promised by President Roosevelt in a speech delivered, I believe at Baltimore, that the tariff protection on American farm products would not be lowered to the detriment of the American farmer.

As I read the record neither of those promises has been kept.

I am aware of the fact that figures can be misleading, especially trade statistics. I can select certain months and certain years, and certain commodities, and paint a picture in figures that may be true in detail, and yet convey an entirely erroneous impression as to the whole situation. I know this because I have listened to some of the speeches of those favoring the trade agreements—and that is just what those speakers have done.

On the other hand, I believe we can go to the record and get the facts. That is what I have tried to do.

As is generally known, there are two classes of farm commodities which are imported into the United States. Some are competitive, such as cattle, hogs, beef, pork, lard, butter, grains, cotton, and so on—a long list. Some are noncompetitive, such as coffee, rubber, bananas, and other tropical fruits not produced in marketable quantities in the United States.

The Department of Agriculture has divided the farm commodities that are imported into these two classes, and keeps separate records of them.

It would manifestly be unfair, in making comparisons, to include noncompetitive farm commodities, such as coffee, rubber, and so forth, and I would not be guilty of that.

It would be unfair to compare the years 1929 and 1939 to show whether farm exports had increased or decreased under the reciprocal trade agreements. All the world knows that foreign trade was at a peak along about 1929. It was far below the peak last year.

Neither, to my mind, would it be fair to base comparisons solely on 1932 with any trade-agreement years.

After thinking over the matter, I decided that if I should take the last 5 years before the trade agreements were effective, and the first 5 years afterward, and if I should keep competitive and noncompetitive farm imports separated, I might get a fairly accurate picture of what had happened.

I should not be able, even then, to say that any results shown would absolutely be caused by the trade agreements, but at least I should have a picture of what happened along with the trade agreements.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics, as I understand, makes its crops statistics generally on a fiscal-year basis, that basis corresponding more closely to crop marketing years than do the calendar-year figures. So I got those figures, and here they are:

First, there are competitive farm products for the 5-year period ending June 30, 1934. The Trade Agreements Act was approved in June of 1934, and became effective in September of that year. Here is the record on imports of competitive farm products.

These figures are for fiscal years ending June 30 of the year shown:

Competitive farm imports

Before:
1930	$889,122,000
1931	512,020,000
1932	374,890,000
1933	282,428,000
1934	418,515,000

Since:
1935	$497,892,000
1936	641,622,000
1937	866,775,000
1938	588,316,000
1939	486,140,000

The average for the 5-year period before the trade agreements was $495,395,000 worth of competitive farm products imported.

The average for the 5 years of trade agreements was $616,149,000 of competitive farm products imported.

In other words, imports of competitive farm products in the 5 years under the trade agreements averaged annually $120,754,000 more than for the 5 years before the trade agreements.

Imports of competitive farm products increased 25 percent under the trade agreements. These are the commodities grown for market on American farms.

Now, let us see what the record shows on imports of noncompetitive farm commodities for the same two 5-year periods:

Noncompetitive farm imports

Before:
1930	$1,010,399,000
1931	649,572,000
1932	459,000,000
1933	331,309,000
1934	420,437,000
Since:
1935	435,882,000
1936	499,569,000
1937	669,920,000
1938	566,820,000
1939	486,140,000

The average value of noncompetitive farm commodities imported in the 5 years before the trade agreements was $574,143,000 annually.

The average value of noncompetitive farm commodities imported in the 5 years of trade agreements was $536,933,000 annually.

In other words, for the 5 years of the trade agreements the average annual value of noncompetitive farm commodities imported was $37,210,000 less, or a decrease of 7 percent.

What that means is just this:

Under the trade agreements, whether because of them or in spite of them, based on the records of the two 5-year periods, imports of competitive farm commodities increased 25 percent. Imports of noncompetitive farm commodities, which farmers are glad to see come into the United States, decreased 7 percent.

Now, let us see what happened to our farm-export trade during these two 5-year periods—the last 5 years without the trade agreements, the first 5 years under the trade agreements. Here are the figures:

Exports of farm commodities

Before:
1930	$1,495,823,000
1931	1,038,018,000
1932	752,132,000
1933	589,650,000
1934	787,343,000
Since:
1935	668,713,000
1936	766,303,000
1937	732,474,000
1938	890,771,000
1939	682,962,000

The average annual value of farm exports for the last 5 years before the trade agreements was $932,593,000.

The average annual value of farm exports for the first 5 years of the trade agreements was $784,244,000.

In other words, the average annual value of farm exports was $184,389,000 less under the trade agreements, or a decrease of approximately 20 percent.

Mr. President, I should not consider it fair to attribute this drop of 20 percent in farm exports during the 5 years of the trade agreements to the trade agreements. In the first place, world trade was less during the second 5 years than during the first 2 years of the first period; also, world prices were lower.

That, however, is not the point.

The significance of these figures is that for the first 5 years of the trade agreements, as compared with the last 5 years before the trade agreements—

Imports of competitive farm commodities increased 25 percent.

Imports of noncompetitive farm commodities decreased 7 percent.

Exports of farm commodities decreased 20 percent.

Frankly, I do not see how it can be maintained that any program under which imports of competitive farm products have increased 25 percent, while exports of farm commodities have decreased 20 percent, is helping the American farmer.

It may be that the program is helping the farmers of the rest of the world, but it certainly is not helping the American farmer. We are supposed to be taking care of the American farmer first, as I understand—and we were given to understand 6 years ago that this program would help the American farmer.

I maintain, on the contrary, that the American farmer has suffered under the trade-agreements program, whether that suffering has been caused by the trade-agreements program or not.

I think the figures tell their own story.

While on the subject of exports and imports, Mr. President, I believe I shall read an excerpt from a statement released by the Department of Commerce on January 31, commenting on foreign trade in 1939. Incidentally, I may state that the figures in this statement refer to calendar years, while the figures I quoted from the Department of Agriculture deal with fiscal years.

Under the heading "Foreign trade in 1939," the Department of Commerce statement just referred to says:

> Total United States exports during the 12 months ending in December were larger in both volume and value than in 1938. The increase in aggregate value was from $3,094,000,000 in 1938 to $3,177,000,000 in 1939. * * * In terms of volume, export trade was about 5 percent larger in 1939 than in either 1937 or 1938. * * * In December the volume of exports reached the high level of the final months of 1929, although their aggregate value was considerably smaller because of lower export prices.
> The rise in exports during 1939, as compared with 1938, was primarily the result of the increase in foreign demand for United States manufactures during the last half of the year. During the early months of 1939, exports of both manufactured and agricultural products dropped below those in the same period in 1938.
> Beginning in May, however, there were consistent gains in shipments of manufactured articles which resulted in substantially larger exports of metals and manufactures, aircraft, machinery, lubricants, and chemicals for the year.
> Comparatively heavy exports of cotton during the last 5 months of 1939 brought total shipments for the year above the total for 1938.

Now comes the sentence to which I particularly wish to call the attention of the Senate. I quote:

> The value of the exports of all agricultural products dropped from $828,000,000 in 1938 to $656,000,000 in 1939, the lowest figure in a number of years. Exports of grain and preparations declined by 55 percent.

I wish to point out at this time, Mr. President, that so far as wheat is concerned, what exports there were resulted from subsidization of exports by the Department of Agriculture, and were not due in any respect to the reciprocal trade agreements program.

I asked Secretary of Agriculture Henry Wallace about this subject when he was before the Senate Finance Committee, and he said—page 87 of the unrevised hearings:

> Secretary WALLACE. I would like to indicate, with respect to wheat, Senator, that it would prove absolutely nothing, because we had during this period an export subsidy working.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], chairman of the committee, asked Secretary Wallace:

> It is a fact that the price has increased on wheat, is it not? Wheat is higher now than it was 2 or 3 years ago, or in 1932.
> Secretary WALLACE. Why, yes, of course, the price is higher, but I would say the price is higher now chiefly because of the drought.
> The CHAIRMAN. Then the record also shows in 1933——
> Secretary WALLACE (interposing). I wish to point out that all of this discussion about wheat is totally irrelevant and has no bearing on the trade-agreement program. We should not attribute the high price of wheat at the present time to the trade agreements. I do not think the trade agreements have had anything important to do with that.

In other words, Mr. President, the reciprocal-trade agreements have not helped the wheat farmer; and there certainly has been nothing to indicate that they have helped him either directly or indirectly.

Returning for a moment to the subject of all agricultural exports, I desire to call attention to another phase of that matter. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the decreasing share agriculture has in what export trade the United States enjoys.

In the fiscal year 1930 the percentage that farm exports was of total exports had reached a new low of 32.4 percent. That was not unnatural. This Nation has become increasingly an industrial nation. For the decade after the World War we were a creditor nation, not a debtor nation; and, also, from 1925 on, the nations of Europe were engaged on a program of self-sufficiency, particularly as to foodstuffs.

But suppose we take the two 5-year periods again—the last 5 years without the trade agreements and the first 5 years of the trade agreements. Here are the percentages farm exports were of all exports for those 10 years:

Before the trade agreements:

	Percent
1930	32.4
1931	34.2
1933	41.8
1934	39.2

Then the reciprocal-trade agreements, which were to increase the foreign markets for farm commodities, went into effect. What happened?

Mr. President, the percentages tell the story:

	Percent
1935	32.1
1936	32.3
1937	26.3
1939	23.7

I might add, Mr. President, that for the calendar year 1939 American agriculture's share in our export trade was a fraction over 20 percent.

Have the reciprocal-trade agreements helped American agriculture?

Under the trade agreements, imports of competitive farm commodities have increased 25 percent. Exports have decreased 20 percent.

In the last year before the trade agreements, American agriculture's share of our export trade had risen from the depression low of 32.4 percent to 41.8 percent in 1933 and 39.2 percent in 1934.

Under the promised stimulus of the reciprocal-trade agreements, American agriculture's share of our export trade has now dropped to a fraction over 20 percent.

Mr. President, by what process of rabbit-from-the-hat reasoning can we expect the American farmer to believe that the reciprocal-trade agreements have been helpful to him, or, in fact, anything but hurtful?

Mr. President, I had intended to confine my remarks on the economic aspects of the reciprocal-trade agreements to agriculture, because that is my main interest in them.

I had had the impression, without having made any study of the matter, that the trade agreements probably had been helpful to the manufacturing industries of the United States. I presume I followed a line of reasoning like this:

The trade agreements have not helped American agriculture. While they have been in existence agriculture has lost more and more of its export trade. Imports of competitive farm products have notably increased. It is not conceivable that any administration would adopt and follow and advocate a trade policy or program that hurt both agriculture and manufactures. Therefore, since this program has hurt agriculture, it must have helped manufactures.

But some facts presented by Dr. John Lee Coulter, a former member of the Tariff Commission and former president of the North Dakota College of Agriculture, a man for whose integrity and knowledge I always have had the highest respect, have caused me to doubt whether the trade agreements have helped even the manufacturing industry of the United States on the whole, though they may have been of benefit to certain industries, such as the automobile- and typewriter-manufacturing industries.

Dr. Coulter was one of the witnesses before the Finance Committee, of which I happen to be a member. Because I regard him as an authority on the subject of foreign trade as a whole, I am going to include part of his statement in my remarks at this time. I will say that his testimony before the committee and the figures he presented have raised grave doubts in my mind as to whether even the manufacturers of the United States have benefited from these reciprocal-trade agreements to date. I know that agriculture has not.

Great stress has been laid, Dr. Coulter told our committee, upon the idea that under the reciprocal-trade agreements the United States has been able to secure many so-called concessions from foreign countries intended to mitigate foreign-trade barriers, thereby increasing the export trade of the United States. Proponents of the trade agreements have urged that the United States might at least, through these agreements, hope to recover some of the foreign market formerly held for surplus agricultural products of the United States, in addition to certain industrial products of mass production. It has been maintained that this would aid directly in solving the farm problem, and that indirectly, by providing employment in factories for the export market, a better domestic market for American farm products would be provided. But an objective analysis of our foreign trade, Dr. Coulter stated, does not bear out this contention. While foreign nations have made gestures of friendship in the form of so-called concessions, many, if not most of the same nations, have proceeded to increase, rather than decrease, barriers against our export trade.

These trade barriers erected against us, in exchange for our lowering of barriers against imports, have consisted of: First, quota systems with licenses, permits, and so forth; second, exchange-control programs, including blocked exchanges, and so forth; third, barter arrangements, compensation agreements, and so on; fourth, internal regulations and controls, such as in the use of imported products in combination with or as substitutes for domestic materials; and, fifth, a dozen other miscellaneous devices which have the effect of revisions of tariff schedules to offset the gestures of lowering barriers through trade agreements.

It would seem—

that the only objective approach would be to attempt to measure the results secured from the so-called foreign concessions in trade agreements thus far put into effect. The first trade agreement negotiated under the program did not become effective until September 1934. We may, therefore, take the first 8 months of 1934 as the last substantial period prior to the first trade agreement. It is unsatisfactory to go back to an earlier period such as 1932 or 1933 because of the complete change in international monetary relations due to currency devaluation—

And so forth. Dr. Coulter maintained before the Senate Finance Committee:

In contrast, after September 1, 1939, a new World War had enveloped the leading countries of Europe. We may, however, take the first 8 months of 1939 as the most representative recent period available, especially since the new Canadian agreement and the agreement with the United Kingdom became effective January 1, 1939.

I myself think that for the purpose of obtaining a fair comparison between two representative periods, the comparison between the first 6 or 8 months of 1934 and the first 6 or 8 months of 1939 is an equitable comparison.

During the first months of 1939, trade with five foreign areas was in a state of chaos, as Dr. Coulter told the committee, due to invasions, declared and undeclared wars, revolutions, moral embargoes, economic sanctions, trade discriminations, and so forth. These five areas were Germany, including Austria and Czechoslovakia; Italy, including Ethiopia and Albania; Spain; Japan; and China, including Manchuria and the Chinese ports. So, to make the comparison fair, we eliminate those five areas from the trade totals for both periods.

Bear in mind, I am now discussing all exports, not just those of farm commodities. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in my remarks the table presented to the committee by Dr. Coulter, showing United States exports, including reexports, for the first 6 months of 1934 and 1939, by groups of countries, the monetary figures in the table being in thousands of dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REED in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Excluding those involved in revolutions and declared or undeclared wars.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I wish now to call the attention of the Senate to what this comparative table shows without reciting all the detailed figures.

First, it shows total exports to all countries for the first 6 months of 1934. The 6-month, instead of 8-month, comparison is used because figures for 6-month periods are more easily available. The figures for 8 months would not show any material difference in percentages.

Second, total exports to all countries for the first 6 months of 1934 amounted to $1,036,053,000.

Total exports to all counties for the first 6 months of 1939 amounted to $1,415,427,000.

Total exports to all countries during the 1939 period were $397,374,000 more than for the 1934 period, or an increase in export trade of 33.4 percent.

Total exports to the war-torn countries for the first 6 months of 1934 amounted to $257,245,000.

Total exports to the war-torn countries for the first 6 months of 1939 amounted to $227,745,000.

Total exports to the war-torn countries for the 1939 period were $29,500,000, or a decrease of 11.4 percent.

To all other countries, exports in the 1934 period amounted to $778,808,000; for the 1939 period, to $1,187,682,000; showing an increase in exports of $408,874,000, or 52.5 percent.

Now we come to the separation of the trade-agreement countries from the nonagreement countries, excluding the five war-torn areas—greater Germany, Italy, Spain, China, and Japan.

The record shows that our total exports to these trade-agreement countries in the first 6 months of 1934, including Cuba, with whom we really have a bilateral instead of the unilateral agreement, amounted to $561,192,000. This was before the agreements were in effect.

Total exports to these trade-agreement countries for the first 6 months of 1939 amounted to $824,376,000.

Total exports to these trade-agreement countries were larger during the trade-agreement period by $263,184,000, showing an increase of 46.8 percent.

But the total exports to the non-trade-agreement countries, excluding the war-torn areas, increased from $221,120,000 in the 1934 period to $374,238,000 in the 1939 period. This is an increase of $153,118,000, or 69.2 percent.

The point is that in these representative periods the increase in exports to the trade-agreement countries was 46.8 percent; the increase to the non-trade-agreement countries was 69.2 percent.

After checking these figures, Mr. President, I fail to see where the reciprocal-trade agreements have been of any material assistance to our exports of manufactures.

We already know that the trade agreements have injured, rather than helped, American agriculture.

So, except for propaganda and campaign purposes, I fail to see the value of these reciprocal-trade agreements at all beyond the expression of a praiseworthy aspiration to return the world toward a free-trade basis at the expense of American agriculture and American industry.

Before leaving the economic aspects of the trade agreements, I desire to call attention to another thing which has injured one of our basic industries. I refer to the petroleum industry. In 1932 a long-delayed protection was afforded the independent petroleum producers by the levying of an import excise tax on petroleum and certain petroleum products. The protection afforded was not large, only 21 cents a barrel, which certainly was not excessive. At the same time import excise taxes were levied on coal, lumber, and copper.

I think it was plainly the intent of Congress, when the original Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act was considered, that these excise taxes were not to be included in the scope of any trade-treaty negotiations. I call attention to the following statement in the reports of the Senate Finance Committee and the House Ways and Means Committee to the respective branches of Congress.

> In order that the necessary reciprocity be accorded, the President is empowered to promise that existing duties which affect imported goods will not be increased during the term of any particular agreement. It should be carefully noted, however, that the President is given no right to reduce or increase any excise duty. His power of reduction of duties is limited to those which are, in fact, customs duties.

I think that Congress intended—it certainly should have intended—to keep control over these excise taxes in its own hands.

However that may be, last December a trade agreement was negotiated with Venezuela by which the excise tax on imports of crude petroleum and other products of petroleum was reduced 50 percent.

Mr. President, this reduction threatens the stability of the petroleum industry in both the midcontinent and the west-coast fields. It is a serious threat to the independent petroleum producers. It does not materially help Venezuela; it does tend to give three large oil companies the power to control prices of petroleum products in the Atlantic seaboard region; it breeds monopolistic control of the oil industry.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this situation at length at this time. I have offered an amendment to correct this misuse, as I see it, of the powers granted the Executive through the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, which I intend to call up at the proper time. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed at this time as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> On page 1, line 8, after "1940," insert a comma and the following: "with the proviso that the authority conferred in the said act does not embrace authority to include in any trade-agreement negotiations excise taxes imposed under the provisions of paragraphs (4), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (c) of section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, which are now a part of the Internal Revenue Code, subtitle (c), chapter 29, subchapter (b), part 1, sections 3420, 3422, 3423, 3424, and 3425."

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the effect of this amendment is to exclude changing these import excise taxes on oil, copper, coal, and lumber from the provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. I believe it should be agreed to.

Before closing, Mr. President, I desire to discuss briefly some of the broader implications of this legislation, especially the surrender by the Senate of its constitutional power over the ratification of treaties, and the surrender of the Congress of its power over revenue and taxation.

Mr. President, we have been called upon from overseas in the past to save democracy in a world in which democratic institutions are seriously imperiled. We are looking forward to a repetition of that call in some form in the not-far-distant future. It seems to me that we also have a call, and a much more urgent one, to save the democratic processes here at home.

All over the world we see details of government, powers of government, turned over or being turned over to the executive. For several years past the same trend has been distinctly observable here. The American people are alarmed over the encroachments of arbitrary power and the tyranny of one-man government. The country is greatly disturbed over the unrestrained increase of Executive authority without the full knowledge of the people.

One by one Congress is turning over legislative functions, powers, responsibilities, and duties to the executive branch of the Government. Some of these powers, it is true, are merely matters of administrative details. Theoretically it may be true that what Congress gives Congress later may take away. But getting back power from a strongly entrenched executive department is not a simple matter. It is not an easy thing to do. When the time comes when we wish to restore to Congress the legislative powers which have been granted the Executive we may find that impossible without something approaching revolution.

Mr. President, the original Trade Agreements Act, extension of which for another 3 years we now are considering, I believe transcends and violates the Constitution by allowing the Executive to negotiate treaties and make them effective without ratification by the Senate. When we approved the original act we attempted to short-cut the Constitution to get quick results. All over the world legislative powers have been surrendered to the Executive in the effort to attain results by short-cut methods. All over the world we see the baneful results of this surrendering by the legislative representatives first one and then another of the legislative powers to the Executive. Not always do the people have an opportunity of getting these powers back. We believe that every citizen should have the right to be heard.

In this instance the people of the United States, through Congress, have the power to get back the constitutional control over treaty making—a power first granted temporarily for a 3-year period, since extended another 3 years. Congress can take a step back toward representative government by adopting the Pittman amendment to the pending joint resolution. I have had a similar amendment before the Senate for more than 3 years, requiring ratification by the Senate of all treaties negotiated under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. My amendment failed of adoption when it was submitted to the Senate in 1937. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada will prevail at this time.

This amendment simply provides that—

> No foreign-trade agreement entered into after the date of the enactment of the joint resolution under section 350 shall be effective unless concluded by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as in the case of treaties.

It may be contended that trade agreements do not rise to the dignity of treaties. If that were the case—and I make no admission that it is the case—then evidently the trade agreements would have the effect of laws.

Considering trade agreements as laws, it is evident that they are laws affecting revenue, because in them are provisions by which the revenues collected by the Government may be increased or decreased by changing the rates of customs duties on imports. It seems to me perfectly plain that the fixing of tariff or customs rates is a legislative function, under our Constitution. The same Constitution provides that all legislative power is vested in the Congress. It also provides that revenue legislation must originate in the House of Representatives.

It seems to me the conclusion is inescapable that if we, as Senators, as Members of Congress, are alive to our duties and responsibilities, we must take one of two views on this matter; we must choose between these alternatives, or be derelict in our duties under the oath we took to support the Constitution.

First, we can decide that these trade agreements are in effect treaties, and require Senate ratification.

Second, if we decide not to hold them as treaties, then we must view them as amendments to the revenue laws, and as such they should receive the approval of Congress.

My own view is that a trade agreement is both a treaty and an amendment to existing revenue laws, and as such should have Senate ratification, as in the case of a treaty, and congressional approval as an amendment to existing revenue acts.

I believe also, however, that the form and spirit of representative government would, for all practical purposes, be preserved if either Senate ratification or congressional approval were required. Therefore, I am suggesting Senate ratification, though I will gladly support an amendemnt to require congressional approval.

In this connection I desire to call attention to the fact that the nations with which we have negotiated 22 trade agreements on the whole take the view that these agreements are subject to legislative control. Eighteen of the twenty-one nations with which we have negotiated these agreements—two agreements were entered into with Canada—have required their parliamentary bodies to approve them before they became effective. Only three nations—Ecuador, Venezuela, and Cuba—did not require this approval. Mr. President, we lay claim to being the leading democracy of the world. We will not be if we continue this whittling away of legislative powers, this continual transfer of all government powers in the Executive.

Mr. President, one more thought in closing. It seems to me that the time has come for the United States to take stock, to get a revaluation of fundamental national policies.

In the domestic field we are pursuing a high-price, high-wage level, the so-called American standard-of-living policy. If those prices, those wages, that level of living are to be maintained, we cannot, in the light of reason, carry on at the same time a foreign trade policy which provides for imports of commodities produced under conditions such as low wages, long hours, low living conditions, and low price levels.

If we are to maintain prices, wages, and living conditions on a much higher than the world level, it seems inconsistent at the same time to be trying to promote imports produced on the lower world level of wages, prices, and living.

I have known men who could work both sides of the street, to use a phrase understood by most Senators. In the circus I have seen performers ride two horses at once—but the horses had to be going in the same direction.

I do not remember ever having seen even a circus performer attempt to ride two horses going in opposite directions. It seems to me that is what we are trying to do here.

Along the same line of thought I might mention also that through our Department of Agriculture and our Department of State we have in force two absolutely contradictory farm programs.

Secretary of Agriculture Wallace is making payments to American farmers to adjust production downward, subsidizing American farmers for producing less.

Secretary of State Hull is in effect subsidizing the farmers of other nations to produce more, and to sell that increased production in the American market.

Mr. President, those two programs just do not make sense.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not also true that we are committed in our wage and hour law and in similar statutes to work for a rising level of wages and a reduced scale of hours, and that that is equally in contradiction of the policy of lowering tariffs?

Mr. CAPPER. That is true.

Just one other point upon which I will not elaborate. I am convinced it is a mistake to include the unconditional most-favored-nation clause in these agreements. Without going extensively into the matter, I call attention to the fact that trade agreements are a very special type of commercial treaty. They should be bilateral in character; otherwise, in too many instances, it will be found that we make concessions to a number of nations and get concessions only from one.

If any most-favored-nation clause is inserted in any of these agreements, it should be the conditional construction, not the wide open and greatly abused unconditional most-favored-nation clause. In support of this I quote from the United States Tariff Commission in its special 1919 report on reciprocity and commercial treaties, page 42:

> The evidences show that the conclusion of reciprocity treaties is likely to lead to claims from states outside the agreement, which, if granted, will defeat the purpose of the treaties, and which, if not granted, occasion the preferring of a charge of disloyalty to treaty obligations. The practice of making reciprocity treaties requires the conditional construction of the most-favored-nation clause.

Mr. President, I also point to the case of the zinc industry in this connection. The second trade agreement with Canada included sizable concessions on zinc and cadmium. Canada is not and was not a heavy importer of products into the United States, the amount being 12 percent of total zinc imports and 8 percent of cadmium imports. But Mexico, from whom we received no concessions, sends us 59 percent of our total imports of zinc, and Belgium sends us 71 percent of the cadmium we import.

Only the outbreak of the World War saved the domestic zinc-mining industry from serious injury by reason of letting down the bars against Mexican and Netherlands importations of these metals, as the result of our granting what appeared to be a minor concession to Canada.

I say that is an argument in favor of restricting the concessions made to those countries granting us no concessions in return.

Mr. President, let us abandon this nonsensical reciprocal trade agreements program and get down to earth in our economic thinking. I shall vote against the pending joint resolution unless it is amended to include the constitutional safeguard of Senate ratification before the negotiated treaties become effective.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed as part of my remarks numerous resolutions and letters from farm and other organizations supporting the views I have just expressed in opposition to the reciprocal trade agreements program as it is being administered at present, and appealing to Congress to provide for Senate ratification of all treaties if the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act shall be reenacted by Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1940.

To the Members of the Senate:

If the legislation calling for the renewal of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for another 3 years, which is now before the Senate, is to be approved, the National Grange is strongly of the opinion that this measure should be amended in certain respects so as to safeguard the interests of the American people.

In the first place, this measure should be amended so as to provide for joint congressional ratification of all future trade agreements that may be made. It is interesting to note that in 16 of the 22 countries with which we have made trade pacts these agreements or treaties have been subject to parliamentary ratification. But here in the United States, the greatest republic in the world, in violation of both the letter and the spirit of the fundamental law, the Senate has been deprived of its constitutional right to pass on these treaties.

Moreover, the Constitution provides that all revenue legislation must originate in the House. It cannot be denied that the right to raise or lower tariff duties to the extent of 50 percent affects revenues. As an illustration, by virtue of the fact that the duty on Cuban sugar was reduced from 2 to .9 cents per pound the Treasury sustained a loss of revenue between September 3, 1934, and December 31, 1939, amounting to $133,924,000. In the days when we depended upon the tax yield rather than deficit financing to defray the cost of government this would have been considered quite a sizeable sum. In the meantime the retail price of sugar to the consumer has not been reduced to the extent of a single mill. The chief beneficiaries have been two of the biggest banks in Wall Street, which own the major portion of the Cuban sugar industry. All this was done in violation of the constitutional principle that revenue legislation must originate in the House.

Senator MCCARRAN has announced his intention of proposing an amendment providing for the levying of excise taxes on all imports on the dutiable list when the landed costs of such goods fall below the American wholesale selling price. It is understood that this rule shall apply only to imports of commodities that are commercially available in the United States.

Since many artificialities and restrictions have been imposed upon our system of free enterprise during recent years which operate to increase our cost of production and of doing business, it is manifestly impossible to maintain these artificial standards while permitting unrestricted competitive imports from countries where substandard labor conditions exist and where costs of production are lower than in the United States. We are therefore heartily in favor of the adoption of Senator MCCARRAN'S amendment. There are various other amendments that should be made to this legislation, but we consider the two that have been indicated as of primary importance.

From the standpoint of the American farmer, the working of the 22 trade agreements that are now in effect have been worse than useless. Since 1934, when the Reciprocal Tariff Act was passed, the value of our agricultural exports has declined while competitive imports have increased. No amount of specious reasoning nor the juggling of foreign-trade statistics can obscure the facts in the case.

Under the guise of soil conservation the Government is paying the farmers of the country approximately $500,000,000 a year to reduce acreage and production, while permitting, and even encouraging, competitive imports of farm products valued at more than this sum. Moreover, it is important to keep in mind that our imports are priced on the basis of foreign costs. The import figures do not include the cost of transportation, insurance, and customs duties. If these items were added, the total import figures would be much higher.

Then, too, it must not be forgotten that competitive imports are always offered at a lower price than that which prevails at home. These imports place a ceiling, so to speak, on our price level, rendering it virtually impossible for domestic producers to secure prices commensurate with our higher costs of production and the American standard of living. The situation with which we are now confronted under the workings of the Trade Agreements Act is destroying the morale and the independence of the farmers of the country, and it is gradually reducing them to the status of wards of the Government.

Those who take the position that the United States Senate cannot be trusted to perform its proper functions in regard to these trade treaties not only turn their backs on the Constitution, but they betray their lack of faith in the processes of popular government. We regard it as a very grave mistake and a perversion of fundamental principles for Congress to delegate legislative power to the executive branch of the Government. That is what the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act does, and it should not be renewed without proper amendments.

Yours sincerely,

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
FRED BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative.

[Adopted at Seventy-third Annual Convention of National Grange at Peoria, Ill., November 23, 1939.]

THE AMERICAN MARKET

Since many artificialities and restrictions have been imposed upon our system of free enterprise during recent years which operate to increase our cost of production and of doing business, and since it is useless to attempt to maintain these artificial standards while permitting unrestricted competitive imports from countries where substandard labor conditions exist, and where costs of production are lower than the United States, it is manifest that proper steps must be taken to protect American interests. Under prevailing conditions, we favor the levying of excise taxes on all imports on the dutiable list when the landed cost of such goods falls below the American wholesale selling price. Provided, however, that this rule should only apply to imports of commodities that are commercially available within the United States.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

The reciprocal trade agreements program has caused serious damage to American agriculture. It has depressed farm prices by encouraging imports of competitive products from countries where substandard labor conditions prevail. It is wrong in principle and violates the Constitution. It should not be renewed when it expires by its own limitations on June 12, 1940.

[Adopted by Thirty-fourth Annual Convention of Kansas State Farmers Union at Wakeeney, Kans., on October 24, 1939.]

We deplore the large importations from foreign countries of farm products in competition to American farmers; be it resolved that the Farmers Union take a firm stand against reciprocal-trade agreements which are negotiated without congressional ratification.

The National Farmers Union, in its 1939 convention at Omaha last November, left the reciprocal-trade program unmentioned, but stated its reaffirmation for "Protection of the domestic market for American agriculture."

[Adopted by Forty-third Annual Convention of American National Livestock Association held at Denver, Colo., January 11, 1940.]

RECIPROCAL TRADE ACT

Whereas a large majority of our people, and particularly of our agriculturists, is unalterably opposed to reciprocal-trade agreements; therefore be it

Resolved, (a) That we are definitely opposed to an extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act; and (b) That, if said act is extended, it be only on the condition that all new agreements thereunder and extensions of existing agreements be ratified by the Senate in the manner provided by the Constitution.

KANSAS LIVESTOCK ASSOCIATION,
Topeka, Kans., March 16, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: Enclosed you will find complete copy of resolutions adopted by the Kansas Livestock Association in their annual convention at Wichita, March 8, 1940.

I feel that perhaps these will be of assistance to you in opposition to pending legislation, which we consider so detrimental to the welfare of our livestock industry.

Your active support in behalf of such measures as are set forth will be appreciated as have all your other stands on such matters.

Sincerely yours,

WILL J. MILLER, Secretary.

[Adopted by Kansas State Livestock Association]

The following resolution was adopted by the Kansas State Livestock Association at its annual meeting, March 8, 1940, at Wichita, Kans.:

"In view of the large volume of importation of livestock, livestock products, fats, oils, and other commodities competing with our industry, be it resolved, that adequate tariff protection be accorded our domestic products; also that Congress continue its vigilant guard against importation of livestock and its products from Argentina and other countries infected with disease. We also urge Senate ratification of trade treaties by two-thirds majority."

KANSAS STATE GRANGE,

United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed please find pages 56 and 57 as taken from the 1939 Journal of Proceedings containing the resolutions passed at the last session of the Kansas State Grange regarding reciprocal trade.

The Grange has always been nonpartisan in this matter and has led in the fight for tariff justice for more than 50 years.

Thanking you for your interest in this matter, I remain

Very truly,

C. C. COGSWELL,
Master, Kansas State Grange.

[Adopted by Kansas State Grange at annual meeting at Neodesha, Kans., on December 14, 1939]

Whereas the reciprocal-trade treaties which permit the exchange of our manufactured products for agricultural products from foreign countries work to the detriment of the American farmer by bringing the products of foreign labor and land into direct competition with products of our farms: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this body go on record as being opposed to such treaties as ask the repeal of laws that authorize their negotiation; be it further

Resolved, That we condemn the action of Congress in surrendering the treaty-making power.

Resolved, That we reemphasize our former declaration that the American farmer is entitled to the American market up to the limit of his ability to supply it.

American agriculture is not being given the American market which it has been demanding for many years. Reciprocal-trade agreements have worked to the detriment of agriculture instead of to the benefit of it. American agriculture must be given a square deal as compared with other industries if either American agriculture or the Nation itself is to return to its usual prosperous condition. Agriculture is basic, and the sooner other industries recognize it the better it will be for all of us.

[Reciprocal-trade resolution adopted by the National Farmers' Guild at Monticello, Ind., November 21]

For the past several years the Congress of the United States, without constitutional authority, has granted to the President treaty-making powers, without the advice or consent of the United States Senate. Under this reciprocal trade agreement policy, our foreign trade in agricultural products has been penalized for the benefit of certain few large-scale manufacturers. We, therefore, firmly oppose the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act beyond the date of its expiration, June 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I just want to say a few words against the reciprocal-trade agreements. While I know how you stand on that question, I want to bring up a couple of instances which came to my notice a few days ago. I was talking to a man from California who said he was a chemist, knew nothing about farming. He said: "I see shipload after shipload of corn coming into San Francisco harbor from foreign countries, while at the same time our farmers are asked to reduce acreage." He said, "I can't understand it." A friend of mine was talking to a Canadian a short time ago. The Canadian said: "We Canadians are tickled to death over the trade agreements. We can get much more for our livestock than we could before."

What is Secretary Hull and his cohorts up to? Does he want to make slaves of the farmers of the United States? Does he not know, and does he not know that the farmers of this country know, that some of the "ism" countries across the water have just such agreements whereby they can ship in foodstuffs in sufficient quantities to hold prices down for their own farmers, even in a year of short crops. What if these agreements do help industry, which I doubt to any great extent at least.

Our farmers are denied the right of fair prices, while at the same time they are required to pay high prices for machinery and other manufactured goods. The Plains farmer is pretty resourceful. He rebuilds his tractors and combines, and with the aid of the numerous machine shops, many of which are owned by farmers, he can make a good workable machine from a 10-year-old tractor, but don't think he enjoys this. He would rather be able to buy a new model once in a while.

Now as to trade agreements. If those could be negotiated so as not to ship into this country products of which we already have a surplus, it would probably work out all right, but I don't see how any man or group of men can be loyal to our constitutional form of government and still vote for treaties and other programs which are copied from some "ism" form of government. Lets keep America free from foreign "isms." They have nothing to offer except a lot of promises which cannot be fulfilled.

Yours for a continuation and strengthening of our representative form of government.

Yours truly,

C. S. WALKER.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: I am writing you in regard to the amendment for Senate ratification of the Trade Treaties Act.

Please do what you can to get this amendment measure through. This country has just got to get business and trade in place of destroying it as the New Deal administration has been doing. We must eliminate all trade barriers.

Kansas is strictly a livestock and agricultural State and we must have open markets. This New Deal outfit has been catering to the C. I. O.'s, the racketeers, and roughnecks long enough, and the businessman, the honest hard-working man, the farmers, and stockmen are getting tired of it.

Thanking you in advance for anything you can do for us, I remain,

Yours respectfully,

FRED R. COTTRELL.

[From the Kansas State Livestock Association]

KANSAS LIVESTOCK ASSOCIATION,
Topeka, Kans., December 20, 1939.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing you in the interests of the livestock industry of our country which are again being threatened through reciprocal-trade pacts and agreements made, and proposed to be made, by the State Department.

Any reduction in duties on meat animals, meat, or meat products, might retard the industry at a time when it is trying hard to reestablish itself. Kansas farmers and livestock producers oppose any reduction in the duties on beef, beef products, wool, turkeys, eggs, dairy products, corn, flax, alfalfa, or other farm and ranch products.

Farmers of our country desire to cooperate with the State Department and industrial interests, but contend that these agencies should make it easy for them, by helping to remove those things which injure agriculture.

To those of us who have followed the long fight made by livestock interests against importation of beef and beef animals or dairy stock from the Argentine, this is nothing new. It has been on the calendar for many years, and every time there is an excuse to bring the matter up for further consideration, it is done by Government agencies at Washington who are seeking every possible means to increase trade relations with foreign countries, regardless of their economic effects on domestic production. It seems to me that the matter of trade agreements is one of economics rather than of foreign relations, and should be approached from that angle alone.

The fact that importation of meat and meat animals, dairy products, and products of the farm and ranch works a hardship on American producers, and the fact that the dread foot-and-mouth disease is prevalent in many sections of South America, seems not to have any consideration. Secretary Hull apparently intends to strengthen trade relations with South American countries wherever possible, even at heavy cost to American agriculture.

On behalf of the Kansas Livestock Association, a voluntary nonprofit organization composed of progressive farmers and livestock producers of Kansas and adjoining States, including feeders, marketers, and producers of cattle, hogs, and sheep, I am urging you to use every means at your command to safeguard domestic interests in the matter of these trade agreements. Authority for submission of this statement on behalf of the Kansas Livestock Association and for such representation on behalf of the association as may be contained herein is given in a resolution adopted by our association at its last annual convention, March 1–3, 1939, reading as follows:

"We recommend, in view of the large volume of importation of livestock, livestock products, fats, oils, and other commodities competing with our industry, that full and adequate tariff protection be accorded our domestic products; also that Congress continues its vigilant guard against the importation of livestock and livestock products from Argentina and other countries infected with diseases."

At every annual meeting of the association in recent years resolutions of almost identical content and language as that just above quoted have been adopted. Therefore adequate, equitable protection for our domestic producers against the importation of livestock and livestock products from foreign countries has long been an established policy of our association.

It is our sincere belief that full protection of our domestic market for our domestic producers, based on such tariff rates and import levies as will at least equalize cheap production costs prevailing in foreign countries with those encountered by our domestic producers, will serve to promote higher living standards in all agricultural pursuits and will revive agricultural buying power, the possibilities of which can only be released by placing agriculture on an equality with the industrial and commercial lines of our domestic economy.

Therefore on behalf of the membership of the Kansas Livestock Association I desire to respectfully enter protest against the granting of any concessions by way of reduction in existing tariff rates or import levies covering any of the items hereinabove referred to and to urge that existing rates be not only maintained but increased within reasonable bounds wherever possible.

Also may I urge that the 22 now existing and effective treaties with foreign nations be abrogated insofar as their provisions have to do with imports of agricultural products, and that all future negotiations of this character have Senate approval before they are effective?

Yours very truly,

WILL J. MILLER,
Secretary, Kansas Livestock Association.

Senator CAPPER,

DEAR SENATOR: Your address of January 6 on reciprocity agreement I heartily concur in as one of the most aggressive and comprehensible arguments I ever heard of, and I am 85 years old and always took great interest in our Republican tariff enactments and always found them to be in principle the best legislation that could possibly be enacted.

My experience and observation brought me to believe and assert that the Democratic Party as a whole did not have the business ability to properly run our great country and now know I was absolutely right.

Democratic administrations most always upset business and always were improved by a change to Republican administrations.

The New Deal is proving the most disastrous administration on record. You have my full consent and approval as Senator from Kansas, and hope you will again be successful in the next Congress.

AMERICAN NATIONAL LIVESTOCK ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., March 8, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: We wish to submit our views relative to the following legislative matters, which are of vital concern to our industry:

1. Reciprocal Trade Act:

Because of the fact that there is a sharp increase in domestic meat supplies, at a time when export outlets for surplus meat products have been drastically curtailed, and because of the fact that the tariff on cattle weighing more than 700 pounds has already been reduced the full 50 percent possible under the act, the tariff on calves 40 percent, despite which reductions have been proposed on numerous other products, such as canned beef, hides, tallow, etc.;

Therefore, in order adequately to safeguard this important industry, we recommend:

A. That the act be allowed to expire on June 12, 1940.

B. In case it is extended, that an amendment providing for either Senate ratification or congressional approval be adopted.

2. Farm Credit Administration:

We recommend that legislation be immediately adopted that will restore the Farm Credit Administration to its former status as an independent agency.

3. Fair Labor Standards Act:

The original wage and hour bill contained an exemption supposed to apply to packing-house workers during peak periods of employment. The interpretation of this act by the Administrator thereof has narrowed the exemption so as to apply only to the initial operation of slaughtering and dressing and does not give the tolerance that the Congress intended, thereby imposing a serious burden on livestock producers and shippers.

Therefore, we endorse the Barden bill, now pending in the House, but urge that it be so amended as properly to clarify the exemptions on packing-house workers.

4. Wheeler-Lea transportation bill (S. 2009):

We consider it unfortunate that the conference report on this measure, highly important to all branches of American enterprise, cannot be given studied consideration. In the final consideration of same we deem it very essential—

A. That the right of shippers to the shortest direct or through route at the lowest rate perscribed by tariffs between any two given points be insured through the elimination of section 15 (4) of the House bill.

B. That there be no essential change in the provisions of the present fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act which would nullify the restrictions of the long-and-short-haul clause.

C. That there be nothing included in the declaration of policy and no changes in the present rate-making rule that will operate to increase the cost of transportation service to the shipping public.

Respectfully submitted.

CENTRAL COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION,
South St. Paul, Minn., March 4, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United State Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Your address of January 6 on reciprocity agreemously passed at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Central Cooperative Association, composed of delegates from Minnesota, Wisconsin, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana, and which was held at the Lowry Hotel, St. Paul, Minn., on February 14, a copy of which I am enclosing herewith, we respectfully request that you use your influence to secure senatorial ratification of all future trade agreements, and also seek to have the bill amended so that American citizens may enter the courts in behalf of their rights, or to test the constitutionality of the act itself.

The livestock interests of this Northwest territory are very much concerned and alarmed about the possibility of the extension of the Trade Agreements Act in the form passed by the House of Representatives last week. This state of mind has resulted from their experiences under the operation of this act during the past several years. They believe that the authority granted to the administrative branch of our Government under the Trade Agreements Act should be returned to the legislative branch of our Government where the voice of the people of this country can still be heard.

I sincerely hope that you can actively support these views.

Believe me, I am

Sincerely yours,

N. K. CARNES, General Manager.

RE TRADE AGREEMENTS

Northwest agriculture has evidenced its apprehension that trade agreements as now negotiated will have the effect of reducing prices of farm commodities; and

The safeguarding of these price levels is essential to the welfare of Northwest agriculture, and to the welfare of all the interests and industries dependent upon it: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Central Cooperative Association urges the Representatives and Senators from the Northwest to exert their best efforts to secure amendments to the reciprocal trade agreement provisions of the Tariff Act of 1930 to provide that:

(1) No tariff concessions may be made, the effect of which would be likely to reduce or hold the domestic price of any farm commodity below parity; and

(2) In developing trade agreements full hearing must be given to spokesmen for industries or producers of commodities to be affected by treaty concessions, with guaranties of real consideration of such representations, and assurance that no treaty shall be completed until a full and complete record of such hearings has been made available.

(3) The United States Senate must approve each such proposed treaty without amendment of any particular schedules, in order to make it effective.

CALIFORNIA CATTLEMEN'S ASSOCIATION,
San Francisco, Calif., March 12, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: At our annual convention, held in San Francisco in December 1939, the following resolution about reciprocal agreements was adopted:

"Be it resolved, That no further tariff or trade agreements shall hereafter be entered into or caused to become effective until the same have been ratified by the United States Senate, and that we heartily endorse the Coffee bill, H. R. 7589."

When the Reciprocal Trade Act was adopted, Congress declared the purpose was the expansion of foreign markets for our products, as a means of assisting in overcoming a number of our internal problems.

Congress also stated this would be done by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production.

The act, however, has been administered as a tariff-reduction program. Further, the agreements which were under consideration with Argentina and Uruguay listed for concessions on the part of the United States several livestock products.

Official estimates indicate that our domestic cattle population is now 69,000,000 head, an increase of 2,000,000 in the past year. Further increases are expected for the next few years. In 1934, Secretary Wallace guessed that a proper number of cattle for this country at that time would be around 64,000,000, or 5,000,000 less than we now have on hand. Obviously there is no need for encouraging the importation of more cattle and more cattle products.

In view of the attitude of the State Department in favoring tariff reductions on competitive livestock products, we contend that all agreements should be subject to Senate or congressional ratification, so that the domestic livestock industry will receive proper consideration and protection.

Thanking you for your consideration,
Very truly yours,

JOHN CURRY.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: By direction of our executive committee I am writing to express the opposition of our federation to the passage of House Joint Resolution 407 intended to extend the life of the Trade Agreements Act.

I am further directed to advise you that our organization believes that congressional approval of the revenue phases of any future trade agreements which might be enacted, and Senate ratification of the treaty phases of such agreements, together with the right of court review, constitute the minimum protection which Congress should extend the citizens of the United States with regard to the administration of this law, should it be extended.

Following is a summary of our analysis of the act:

1. It gives to the Executive too much power.
2. No definite rule is established to guide the Executive with respect to the reasons why a concession should be made.
3. The act generally may be interpreted as extensions of power rather than limitations of power.
4. The right of persons to court review is practically eliminated.
5. The act extends the President's authority to modification of other import restrictions such as internal taxes on imported products.
6. Notwithstanding claims made by the Secretary of State, the trade agreements are tending to inhibit the liberty of Congress with respect to the enactment of sanitary regulations on imported products.
7. With the act permitting trade agreements to be entered into for periods of not to exceed 3 years, a situation is created whereby one administration may materially interfere with changes of policy with respect to foreign trade which might be intended to be made by a succeeding administration.
8. Contrary to popular impression, the act is not a reciprocity act. It is, in fact, the very opposite of being reciprocal.
9. We believe evidence is overwhelming to prove that the Department of State has exercised bad judgment and has been out-traded in the total of the agreements signed to date.

In my testimony before the Senate Finance Committee (pp. 651–689, inclusive), I laid before that body the result of an appraisal of the trade-agreement program. In terms of our trade in the year 1938 this study showed that we gave to foreign countries total concessions on $561,734,000 more of goods than we received. On duty reductions alone we came out in the red to the extent of $70,420,000. Eleven tables were offered in substantiation of this generally bad trading position in which the United States finds itself as a result of the present trade-agreement program.

We, therefore, respectfully urge the defeat of the resolution in the first instance; and if that is impossible, we urge the minimum of legislative protection as outlined above.

Sincerely yours,

THE NATIONAL COOPERATIVE MILK PRODUCERS' FEDERATION.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The members of the Milroy Livestock Shipping Association, numbering upward to 300 farmers, wish to appeal to you to do all in your power to safeguard the interests of American agriculture during the hearing and in the final vote on the pending legislation to extend the Trade Agreements Act.

We believe that the act, as it now operates, is detrimental to our best interests, principally because its lower tariffs allow foreign goods, which are produced far more cheaply than we can produce them, to come into direct competition with our own.

We cannot reconcile the policy of spending large sums of money to supplement the income of the farmer with that of removing the tariff protection to which we are rightfully entitled.

Hoping that this Congress will give us the protection afforded by congressional approval of all trade pacts, we are,

Respectfully yours,

TWIN CITY MILK PRODUCERS ASSOCIATION,

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: The question now before the Congress of the United States giving the farmers of this country the most concern is that of extending the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for another 3 years without amendment.

We feel that every Senator who votes for such extension without amendment either does not appreciate the farmer's problem and his condition or else is willing to sacrifice his welfare to further the interests of other groups in this country. That the farmer's interests have been betrayed through the reciprocal-trade agreements entered into by this country through our State Department is unquestionably true. That further and even more disastrous curtailment of his income will be made is certain if the act is continued for another 3 years without amendment.

The farmer groups are asking that opportunity for court review and questioning of the constitutionality of the act itself be permitted. Is the Senate now ready to say that the constitutional right of American citizens to appeal to the courts should be taken from them?

The other amendment asked by farm groups is that our Senate approve all trade treaties. Certainly the Senate fails in its obligation under the Constitution as representatives of our democracy—if it still is a democracy—if they fail to pass this amendment. Judge John D. Miller, a well-known Democrat of Susquehanna, Pa., president of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives and counsel for the Dairymen's League of New York, in his address to this council on January 10, 1940, I believe, stated the position of farm groups the best to date I have seen it outlined, and I therefore quote from his address:

"TRADE AGREEMENTS

"Next June the power of the executive department to conclude trade agreements with other countries will expire unless continued by Congress, and the question now widely discussed is whether the law, if continued, should be amended so as to require ratification by the Senate.

"The policy of this council as established several years ago and since adhered to is that these agreements should be ratified by the Senate. In doing so, we would not only be following the orderly processes of democracy but would be following the example of other countries, the most of whom require ratification of such agreements by their respective parliaments.

"Why is the State Department now so aggressive in trying to prevent Senate ratification? It cannot be because they fear the Senate will not act with the best of motives, for this would impeach both the mental and moral integrity of the Members of the Senate.

"It cannot be because they believe the Members of the Senate are not able to decide the questions involved intelligently, for our distinguished Secretary of State, who for several years was a useful Member of the Senate, knows that with remarkably few exceptions the Senate throughout the 150 years of our Nation's life has been composed of able men.

"It therefore seems clear that the reluctance of the executive department to permit ratification of these agreements by the Senate is because they fear that some of the agreements that may be negotiated will not meet with the Senate's approval.

"This position emphasizes the need of Senate ratification, for it is clear that the Senate, composed as it is of two representatives from each of the States, each knowing conditions in their own State, can, by debate and consultation, more accurately appraise their effects than can any small group, however able and sincere, in the executive department, and can therefore ratify such agreements as are helpful and can refuse to ratify those that are harmful.

"Anyone who disagrees with this statement also disagrees with an inspired writer who, many centuries ago, said:

" 'Where no counsel is, the people fall; and in the multiude of counselors there is safety.'

"Some in the Department of State have been quoted in the newspapers as saying that the purpose of those who urge ratification by the Senate is to kill the entire trade-agreement program. This is unjust to both those within and without Congress who favor such ratification. If any of those who urge ratification have such an objective, I doubt if one can be found in the ranks of this council.

"Trade agreements are helpful if they conform to sound policies, which are that under them each of the contracting nations receives things it needs in exchange for things it does not need with balances settled in cash. As a result of some of the agreements that have been concluded large quantities of farm products have been imported that were not needed and that merely added to existing surpluses.

"If the trade-agreement program is killed, the responsibility therefor will not rest upon those who urge ratification but upon those who seem to distrust the orderly processes of democracy."

May we ask with all the emphasis at our command that you use your best efforts to secure these amendments to the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act and vote for them?

Thanking you for any efforts you may make for agriculture by so doing, I am

Very truly yours,

W. S. MOSCRIP.

[Resolution adopted by Kansas Independent Oil and Gas Association at Wichita, December 13, 1939]

Whereas the excise taxes on petroleum imports were imposed by Congress in order to grant some measure of protection to the American petroleum industry against competition with foreign oil produced by cheap labor; and

Whereas the oil-producing States and the domestic petroleum industry have found these taxes an important factor in the constructive national efforts to balance supply with demand in the interests of conservation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Kansas Independent Oil and Gas Association, That we hereby protest to the President of the United States and to the Secretary of State against the reduction of these taxes under the Venezuela trade agreement recently promulgated, for the reason that this reduction in the excise taxes will enable importers who are also large purchasers of domestic crude to further reduce the crude price which is already below a proper level, thereby seriously affecting the incomes of thousands of employees, operators, and the general public in the thousands of communities where the production of oil constitutes their major industry; and that this reduction in the excise taxes actually constitutes a rebate granted to importers of foreign oil at the expense of the United States Treasury and to the harm of the domestic petroleum industry; and we also protest on the ground that Congress did not authorize any reduction in these excise taxes through any reciprocal-trade agreement; that the benefit of the reduced taxes will not go to the Republic of Venezuela nor to the people of Venezuela but to a few American importing companies which, with others, control Venezuelan oil resources. This condition also applies to other nations named in the recent proclamation setting out certain import quotas which are to be allowed at the reduced tax; and be it further

Resolved, That we request the President of the United States to give formal notice, according to law, of the discontinuance of that portion of the Venezuelan trade agreement which pertains to petroleum or its products at the earliest date possible, and cancelation of the quotas outlined in his recent proclamation; and be it further

Resolved, That we petition the Congress of the United States to take appropriate steps to restore these excise taxes to full force and effect.

THE DERBY OIL CO.,
Wichita, Kans., January 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
The Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This will serve to express our emphatic disapproval of the State Department's action in consummating the Venezuelan trade agreement, whereby a 50-percent reduction in excise taxes on imports of crude and fuel oil was effected.

It is obvious from trade journals and statistics that the steadily increasing imports of foreign oil have had a depressing effect on our domestic market with a resultant reduction in pay rolls and income to the American public. As you know, we now have the largest reserve of petroleum that has ever been estimated, and there is adequate reason to believe these reserves may be substantially increased if we can prevent the inflow of competitive cheap-labor-produced oil from the Latin American countries.

First, let's strive to protect the welfare of the American people; and secondly, gain the good will of our neighboring countries which would not hesitate to throw us into a chaotic tail spin if they would benefit from such tactics.

We, therefore, strongly urge you to endeavor to remove such detrimental effects by the enactment of proper legislation to cancel the provisions of the Venezuelan agreement so far as the reduced excise tax is concerned.

We might also state that we are strongly opposed to the proposed Cole oil bill and shall appreciate your efforts to prevent its enactment as a law.

Yours very truly,

THE DERBY OIL CO.,
H. E. ZOLLER,
Executive Vice President.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: During the years 1930 to 1936, while holding the position of county chairman of the Young Republican Club of Dickinson County, it was my pleasure to visit with you on several occasions and am sorry that since that time I have not had the opportunity to renew our acquaintance, but I would like to take this opportunity to state to you my opinion and the opinion of the majority of the oil industry in Kansas relative to the Trade Agreements Act and the proposed Cole bill.

It is my understanding that the House Ways and Means Committee voted to report on the trade-agreements bill, for continuance of the Trade Agreements Act for 3 years, without amendment. This act is very depressing to the oil producers of this State. The amendment proposed by W. E. DISNEY, of Oklahoma, excludes the present four excise taxes (oil, coal, copper, and lumber) from the future trade agreements. I understand that Mr. DISNEY will introduce this bill on the floor of the House, and it is the honest desire of everyone with whom I have talked that this amendment be passed. By thus writing into the law the intent of Congress, that these taxes are exempt from bargaining and trade agreements, Congress would not merely safeguard these excise taxes in the future, but would be taking the first step toward a possible restoration of such of these taxes as have been effected by agreements already made.

For your information, I was connected with the oil and gas conservation division of the Kansas State Corporation Commission for a period of 2½ years and at the present time I am in the employ of John H. Tatlock, independent operator of Wichita, Kans.

You undoubtedly know of the strict proration which the State of Kansas oil producers are producing under at the present time, and with the price of crude very low, as it is, it will be disastrous to all independent operators if more regulation from the Federal Government and other trade agreements affecting the oil industry are entered into. It will mean that many of our oil reserves of Kansas will never be recovered because of insurmountable obstacles placed upon development, thereby causing a loss to the State as a whole and to each one in the State.

In the Venezuela trade agreement, I believe it has been plainly shown that Venezuela did not get the benefits but rather the few importing companies were the sole beneficiaries. I think that insufficient study has been given to the petroleum problem by those negotiating the agreement, because if they had studied the petroleum problem they would find how important these excise taxes were and the need for their supervision by Congress.

At the present time the oil industry seems to really be in a precarious position, partly because of the proposed Federal control; namely, the Cole bill, and partly because of the errors of some States in not having strict proration laws which has resulted in overproduction, but it is my idea that the oil industry can better cope with these situations than by putting all the power into one man's hands in Washington. The majority of the oil-producing States have good proration laws, and I see no reason why they should suffer because a few States do not have any proration laws at this time, but it is the hopes of those in the industry that within the near future conservation laws will be passed in these States.

If Federal control is ever imposed upon the oil industry, the independent operator and the "stripper" well owner will be doomed. Since the small operator produces 70 percent of the oil, in my estimation it seems that some thought should be given in conserving him. He is the adventurer of the oil business and, consequently, risks his fortune to discover new fields, and if Federal control stops this independent operator, new discoveries which would have been made by him will never be found.

Lessening of the tax burdens, both State and Federal, along with the lessening of stifling regulations, are most needed to preserve the oil industry in its every branch in order for it to proceed in its orderly development of sufficient reserves to protect our consumers. Your efforts extended to this conclusion will be a real and lasting service to your constituents.

If your time permits, I would certainly appreciate hearing your views in these matters, and I trust that I will have the pleasure of another visit with you soon.

Yours very truly,

JACK L. WORLEY.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Finance Committee, United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a cattle grower for the past 30 years, I urge you to support the ratification of the so-called reciprocal-tariff agreements by the Senate, as being in reality treaties according to the Constitution, and as such, requiring the approval of our congressional representatives.

Yours respectfully,

HULING MEANS.

BIRD CITY, KANS., March 7, 1940.

DEAR SENATOR ARTHUR CAPPER: I will thank you for consideration of a few facts here presented in reference to the reciprocity treaty now under consideration by the Senate Finance Committee.

These treaties directly concern the farming and laboring classes of the Nation, the farmer in sharing his markets for the sale of the imported article or products, if agricultural, and the loss of the money received for them and the laboring class loses the labor involved in both the producing of agricultural and nonagricultural products or goods.

Citing starch as an illustration of bearing out the above statements, this starch is processed from corn, wheat, rice, and potatoes. The cassava roots from South America and the sago palm from East India and both from other equatorial countries, produced by low-cost labor, and imported into our country at no tariff duties or only small duty, considering these not grown here, but coming in direct competition with our home starch-producing products above mentioned. These foreign products, cassava and sago palm, grown to some extent in warmer sections of our country, might be greatly increased in production in our own country were it not for the foreign competition in our markets.

The enormity of the foreign importations, products and goods, can be estimated somewhat by the immense tariff duties collected by our Government running as high as $30,000,000 some of the months of the year, much of these importations at none or small tariff duties.

The people of our Nation are supporting a Congress of the United States representative of some of our most able citizens and the writer strongly favors that no treaties be put in force with foreign nations except first ratified by the Senate of this Congress and an amendment to the act to enable American citizens to enter court and test its constitutionality. It does hardly seem right and just, and whether even constitutional, that either Congress or the Senate should delegate this treaty-making authority to a small group in Washington claiming statesmanship knowledge to put these important treaties, affecting the people of the Nation, into force with foreign nations and the Senators stand idly by.

Yours truly,

"Resolved, That the Connecticut State Grange reaffirm its stand that all trade treaties and agreements between the United States and other countries become effective only upon approval of the United States Senate, as is provided in the Constitution."

MACOMB, ILL., January 9, 1940.

Mr. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On Sunday, January 7, I listened to the discussion over the radio on the reciprocal-trade agreements, which was very interesting, and I heartily agree with you on your stand. Your opponents seem to think our American markets are not injured by such. I am not a roll-top-desk farmer like some of your opponents. I was born on an Illinois farm in 1893 and have lived at my present location since 1902. I do not approve of the present farm program. I do not participate in it. I do not think it is fair, and it is going to be a heavy burden on the farmers for many years to come for every cent of the benefits received, coupled with cost of administration plus interest on the appropriations. Mr. Noble stated he saw to it that the farmers were not injured in any way. Well, he doesn't know the farm. The present administration seems to think supply and demand is an old, out-of-date theory. Well, you simply cannot get around the fact that it does control prices. They tell us we raised a record crop of hops this past season. Well, I do not understand that. A few years back it was very common to have sixty to eighty thousand fresh arrivals of hogs in Chicago on 1 day, at this time of the year, with prices of $7 to $8 per hundredweight—a reasonable price or a price we should be receiving today. On Thursday, January 4, 1940, Chicago received the heaviest run of hogs of the winter, or 39,000 head, influencing a break in prices. That same evening I loaded 40 head of prime butchers, averaging 280 pounds, which was on the Chicago market Friday, January 5, topping the market for their weight, at $5.30, netting me, after cost of transportation, etc., $4,825. This price was below cost of production, and yet we are importing millions of pounds of pork in order that we may be good neighbors. American hog producers are the goats. Yes; we also have a year's supply of beans on hand, yet we should import more. We have had lately quite an advance in wheat and soybean prices, but who holds the two items? They left the farmers' hands at harvest time due to shortage of ready cash or storage facilities. The majority of farmers are in a worse financial condition at present than at the close of 1933. Farmers have had the opportunity of borrowing for any purpose and buying anything on time that they could wish for without an income to justify such, and I think many feel that their Government benefit payments are a donation.

Poultry prices are ridiculously low. I also handle a few sheep, and I agree with the speaker from the sheep country in regards to starvation wool prices. What is going to become of the corn surplus the Government is hoarding in bins that will not preserve the quality of the grain?—and its presence is a menace to production. Canadian beef, poultry, and wheat have also taken its toll in lowering our prices.

I am for you, Mr. CAPPER, 100 percent, and don't think for 1 minute that the farmers are not waking up to the fact that they have been misled, and will go to the polls to express their dissatisfaction with the present set-up. We are told the farmers' income was greater in 1939 than in 1938. How? By larger Government payments. Is that prosperity?

The labor situation is the biggest handicap to American prosperity today. Labor is being dominated by a bad man, John L. Lewis, backed by the Secretary of Labor and the President. Industry is being shorn of its business freedom—forced to pay a high scale of wages to a few, which the manufacturer passes on to the consumer.

Yours truly,

CLARENCE BREWBAKER.

MILK PRODUCERS FEDERATION OF CLEVELAND,
Cleveland, Ohio, March 5, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: May I present a point of view on the Trade Agreements Act which is being considered by the Senate Finance Committee. I am reporting a point of view for 3,000 dairymen who are members of the Milk Producers Federation of Cleveland.

Our members are made keenly aware of Nation-wide and international competition every year at this time. Buyers of our products begin to insist at this time that they secure their supplies of milk solids (in skim milk) at a price that does not return cost of production or equal the feed replacement value of skim milk.

With our dairy industry on knife-edge balance between supply and domestic demand and an increase in milk production certain as an outcome of our soil-conservation policy, we feel that trade agreements should be subject to review by the Senate. Our farmers have more confidence in the composite judgment of Congress than in the judgment of personnel of the Departments of State, Commerce, and Agriculture, whom we are told have a leading part in determining the policy to be followed on foreign trade since the passage of the Trade Agreements Act. We believe that all interests and all sections of our country will be considered more carefully, if future trade agreements are subject to approval by the Senate.

Among rural people of Ohio there is growing conviction that granting emergency powers of policy determination to executive departments should not be a permanent part of our system of Government. Trade agreements have such far-reaching effects on agriculture that we urge you to favor proposed changes in the Trade Agreements Act, namely: 1. That all future trade agreements be subject to ratification by the Senate. 2. That the language of the existing act be changed to give citizens who believe they are damaged by operation of trade agreements the right of appeal to the courts.

Respectfully yours,

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

According to contract which I have been able to make, I am firmly convinced that 75 percent of the producers of dairy products in Indiana believe that all reciprocal-trade agreements entered into should be subject to ratification by Congress.

DAIRYMEN'S LEAGUE COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION, INC.,

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: An overwhelming percentage of farmers in this area are opposed to reciprocal-trade agreements being made on their present basis.

They dislike the secrecy with which findings are arrived at and the lack of complete public hearings.

They dislike having the making of trade agreements, which approximate treaties in their character, left entirely in the hands of one man or one department, or even one branch of government.

Without perhaps expressing it as concretely as this, they dislike the way the present method of making reciprocal-trade agreements eliminates the checks and balances which have been set up to preserve democracy, democratic government, and the liberty and economic security of individuals or groups.

They further dislike the provision of the present law which prevents individuals or groups from obtaining redress through the third branch of government, namely, the courts, from any inequities or even test the constitutionality of the law itself.

It is not that farmers wish to take away from the State Department the right to negotiate, but they do believe these negotiations should be conducted under the watchful eye of the representatives of the people and that those negotiations for reciprocal-trade agreements, which, I repeat, in their opinion, is merely another name for treaties, should be subject to the constitutional procedure, namely, approval by the Senate.

Sincerely,

FRED H. SEXAUER, President.

PRODUCERS COOPERATIVE COMMISSION ASSOCIATION,
Cincinnati, Ohio, March 4, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: As a member of the Finance Committee of the Senate, we urge your consideration of the following viewpoints regarding the Trade Agreements Act:

Livestock producers and their associations which we have contacted, seem to be in common accord, and opposed to the present plan of handling trade agreements. Our association, composed of more than 20,000 livestock producers and farmers, is quite general in its viewpoint that such trade agreements, having to do with foreign trade, should be ratified by the Senate.

It is recognized that such ratification involves considerable effort on the part of the Finance Committee and the Senate as a whole, yet we are of the opinion that it affords full and thorough consideration in its presentation and working out of its plans and, further, will be a means of providing a fuller representative interest of our farm people and our citizenship.

In light of the above we urge you, as a member of the Senate Finance Committee, which this measure is before, to have future trade agreements to be negotiated, ratified by the Senate.

Thanking you for your earnest consideration of this matter, we remain

Very truly yours,

PRODUCERS COOPERATIVE COMMISSION ASSOCIATION,

NEW YORK STATE GRANGE,
Oswego, N. Y., March 5, 1940.

TO THE FINANCE COMMITTEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The New York State Grange, representing a membership of 132,000 farm folks, wish to express themselves as follows:

We feel that any trade agreement entered into between the United States and any other nation so affects the welfare of all the people in the United States that it should be ratified by the Senate of the United States.

We also wish to request provision be made which will permit any American citizen to enter the courts in behalf of his rights in connection with any trade agreement.

NEW YORK STATE GRANGE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
RAYMOND COOPER, Secretary.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL OF INDEPENDENT SMALL BUSINESS,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1940.

The Honorable ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Regardless of how you stand on the general matter of reciprocity, we know you do stand for the preservation of American standards, political and social.

If treaties are to be negotiated, smaller business men—and there are over 4,000,000 in the country—feel that our interests are safer in the hands of our Senators, who are our duly elected representatives, than in the hands of any appointees or so-called "experts," and trust, if the reciprocity idea is to be continued, that with us, you will fight for the right of review and sanction by the Senate of any and all pacts or treaties that so vitally affect our general welfare.

It was doubtless inadvertent, but it so happens that the industries which are suffering and will suffer the worst—shoes, hats, pottery, laces, woolens—are predominantly small and proprietor-operated; whereas those which will chiefly benefit—automobiles, business machines, electrical appliances, oil products, etc.—are the big and often monopolistically inclined.

A sympathetic and open-minded Senate would uncover these facts, whereas a commission, not being politically responsible, would overlook or ignore them altogether.

May we hope that you will fight for the retention of senatorial approval?

With best wishes.

Cordially,

ALFRED C. GAUNT,
Chairman, National Advisory Council of Independent Small Business Men.

DAIRYMEN'S LEAGUE COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION, INC.,
New York, March 6, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I am associated with thousands of farm women in my work as director of the home department of the Dairymen's League Cooperative Association, Inc., and I find that they, like their husbands, are opposed to the present system of making reciprocal-trade agreements.

In their judgment it is contrary to a democratic government for decisions involving the welfare of so many people to be arrived at by one person, or one state department.

It is their belief that reciprocal-trade agreements should be subject to the approval of the Senate after the proper negotiations have been made by state departments vested with such authority.

They further believe that individuals or groups should have the privilege of the courts for redress of any inequalities which might exist. This privilege is now denied them under the existing laws.

Most cordially yours,

VERA MCCREA,
Director, Home Department.

PRODUCERS COOPERATIVE COMMISSION ASSOCIATION,
Columbus, Ohio, March 6, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The 49,678 stockmen members and patrons of the Producers Cooperative Commission Association have fully considered the Trade Agreements Act, and in their annual meeting just held unanimously decided that the best interests of the livestock farmers and the agriculture of this territory could be better served by having such trade agreements considered and ratified by the United States Senate.

We sincerely trust and believe that you will give the unanimous request of so large a number of stockmen the consideration it deserves.

Thanking you, I am,

Very sincerely,

F. G. KETNER,
Secretary-Treasurer.

FARMERS' AND STOCKMEN'S COMMITTEE
FAVORING SENATE RATIFICATION OF TRADE TREATIES,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I am writing you as chairman of the Farmers' and Stockmen's Committee Favoring Senate Ratification of Trade Treaties. A list of the members of the committee appears on the back of this page.

I wish to urge your serious consideration of the amendment requiring that all future trade agreements be submitted to the Senate for ratification. Future trade agreements may seriously affect the interests of the farmers and stockmen of the country. They feel that they are entitled to a full legislative hearing before such agreements become effective. The amendment requiring Senate ratification will assure this.

Yours very truly,

JACK ARNOLD, Chairman.

COFFEYVILLE CENTRAL LABOR UNION,
Coffeyville, Kans., March 15, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: American trade-unionists seeking to protect the job opportunities and the standards of living of American workers, built up through many years of agitation and organization, secured legislation which prohibits the entry of any Asiatic workers into the United States, and restricts and limits the entry into America of European workers.

They finally secured the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which legislation prohibits the transport in interstate commerce of products of any American workers who are paid less than 30 cents per hour.

All of these protective advantages are now threatened with nullification by our country continuing to enter into alleged reciprocal-trade treaties, which treaties permit the delivery into American markets of competitive products of Asiatic and other workers paid from 5 cents per hour to not more than 20 cents per hour, without any restriction on the transportation of such products throughout America.

As secretary of the Coffeyville Central Labor Union, I have been instructed to urge that you vote against the continued authorization for our entry into reciprocal-trade treaties unless such legislation provides that no foreign-made products, competitive with products of American workers, be admitted to American markets at total costs, all duties paid, which are less than American costs of production or wholesale selling price of competitive American products, which American products are commercially available.

Trusting that we may have your cooperation and support to protect the job opportunities of American workers and thanking you for such help you may give, I am

Sincerely yours,

[SEAL] SID CARAWAY,
Secretary, Coffeyville Central Labor Union.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION,
STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
Pierre, January 19, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: Pressure of other matters has delayed reply to your letter of January 8, dealing with reciprocal trade agreement matters.

You are entirely at liberty to use my letters regarding this proposition in any way you see fit.

I am not to be construed as being opposed to reciprocal-trade agreements of a proper character. Doubtlessly, considerable good can be accomplished by properly guarded agreements, but I do sincerely believe that Congress was wrong in conferring authority to make such an agreement to the executive department, which in turn has transferred that authority to one single person who has made a hobby of this particular line of endeavor.

There are so many ramifications involved in such situations that it is literally impossible to properly weigh and consider all of the elements, even where the propositions are handled by competent, well-informed, generally unprejudiced men, such as a committee of the Senate concerned with the general public interest in such matters and with no delusions that such a program, as reciprocal-trade treaties, will prove a panacea for our economic, international, and other troubles, and there is but slight chance that well-balanced action will be taken by one man, or by one group of men directed by the one man, no matter how well intentioned he may be.

If the present legislation conferring almost unlimited authority to the Secretary of State is extended for another 3-year period, and if the Secretary's present policy is continued, the chances are that American agriculture will receive a set-back that will take a generation to overcome. Those who want the will of a single man—that is, dictatorship—in an important matter of this kind, ought to transfer their activities to a country where that type of government is more popular. The Secretary ought to welcome, not oppose, the help of the Senate in this matter if he has at heart the welfare of the country, not merely the completion of his program. Personally, I think there is more than enough chance to go wrong even where propositions of this kind are subjected to the approval of the Senate.

I note that the Secretary, in his recent testimony before the Senate, referred to the substantial increase in farm income for 1938 versus 1932; also, to the substantial increase in exports of manufactured products, particularly to those countries with which reciprocal-trade agreements have been executed. Those circumstances were referred to by him as clearly the result of the reciprocal-trade treaties. Nineteen hundred and thirty-two was one of our most disastrous years, from the standpoint of farm prices and farm income, and certainly 1938 ought to show a decided increase over that ruinous year. I sincerely hope the committee did not take that single comparison as an indication that American agriculture was back on its feet with ample income and that the reciprocal-trade treaties "did it." The facts are to the contrary.

Regarding increases in exports of American products, there certainly ought to have been a considerable increase in shipments from the United States, for several reasons, including among others, the diversion to the United States of orders that formerly went elsewhere, the diversion to us being due, in part, to the increased activity of European and other manufacturers in their war preparations, also, to the material increase we should expect, owing to the greater activity of American business as a whole, as we overcome the general depression. I think the Senate will find that any economist who would make any sort of an unbiased study of the situation would find that the improvements, referred to by the Secretary, were due to a large number of causes, of which the reciprocal-trade agreements played a very minor part.

It is quite probable that the Secretary is on the right track in his attempts to develop our business relations with other countries, but if so, I certainly hope that some review of, or a check upon his proposals can be made before they are completed.

The suggestion that the extension of our trade with other countries will promote good will among the nations is, like a number of other generalities, rather misleading. A trade agreement with the Argentine, for example, with that country dumping on us its surplus of livestock and agriculture products might please the Argentineans, but I cannot imagine that the other countries, now supplying the Argentine with many commodities, such as our European friends, would feel any more friendly toward us. Trade jealousies can cause as much friction as most any other type of difference. Referring again to the Secretary's statement regarding increased United States farm income, 1938 versus 1932, the last report of the Department of Agriculture shows that in South Dakota the ratio of prices received for farm products, to prices paid on all commodities, is still only 84 percent. The hog ratio is but 55 percent, sheep but 67 percent, with most other prices in proportion. Certain types of cattle are the only important commodity having a favorable price ratio, and the most certain effect of the Argentine proposal would be to knock the props from under the cattle price level.

I am sending copies of this letter to the members of this South Dakota delegation and am again urging them to oppose any extension of the reciprocal trade agreement arrangement except if made subject to approval by one or both of our Legislative bodies.

Yours very truly,

D. L. KELLEY.

TRI-STATE ZINC AND LEAD ORE PRODUCTS ASSOCIATION,
Picher, Okla., March 23, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: We note that the reciprocal-trade issue will probably be before the Senate next week and are writing to remind you that we believe the case for zinc honestly merits some special consideration. You will find the record covering zinc on pages 435–465 of the hearings before the Finance Committee on this subject.

We fully realize a United States Senator is the direct representative of a large variety of interests and that he has the Nation at large to serve as well as his constituents. Therefore, we assume that the facts of our case must of necessity be only one factor in influencing your judgment on the broad issue of reciprocal trade. As far as our particular problem is concerned, we are already tied into the Canadian agreement, and it will not alter our status in that respect whether you vote for or against the reciprocal-trade program. However, I am absolutely sincere in saying that I believe the zinc industry has been unduly damaged and in a way that is contrary to the principles espoused by the administrators of the trade-agreements program. The State Department is actively considering our case with a view to removing us as a commodity from the Canadian agreement.

If you see fit to do this, I assure you that your interest will be deeply appreciated by the personnel of this industry.

Sincerely yours,

EVAN JUST.

CALIFORNIA WALNUT GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
Los Angeles, Calif., March 5, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In connection with the Senate Finance Committee hearing on the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act, may we express to you the strong and very definite opinion of the preponderant majority of our 8,500 growers that this act should be amended to assure Senate ratification.

We have reached this conclusion because our industry has already been badly burned through the terms of the Brazilian treaty, whereby the tariff on Brazil nuts, which already enjoyed the lowest rate granted on any nuts, was cut in half. Walnuts are directly competitive with Brazil nuts.

England, which usually takes 60 percent of this product, has prohibited imports for the duration of the war, with the result that the United States will be flooded with these nuts currently selling at less than half normal prices, and this year's crop of Brazils is estimated to be the largest ever produced—80,000,000 pounds.

Again, we made a reciprocal-trade agreement with England. No benefits were granted the walnut industry under this treaty, but we were permitted to export there at England's previously prevailing rates. Notwithstanding the terms of this agreement, England now prohibits the importation of any American-produced walnuts. They normally take 6,000,000 pounds annually.

If we had had a Senate ratification provision, probably reasonable safeguards would have been insisted upon to prevent situations such as these developing.

Again, the Agricultural Department has just reported that total exports of American farm products, excluding cotton, for the last 6 months of 1939 were 30 percent below those of the last half of 1938, while imports of agricultural products for the same period increased over 20 percent.

No wonder the Federal Government is being called upon to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars annually to encourage farmers not to produce, when Mr. Hull's trade policies have the effect of decreasing agricultural exports and increasing agricultural imports.

American farmers feel they are being sold down the river for the benefit of American industry or in a visionary and vain attempt to improve the standard of living throughout the world.

They feel that Senate ratification offers a possible chance of correcting this intolerable situation. Won't you give it to them?

Sincerely,

C. THORPE, General Manager.

Subject: Reciprocal-trade agreements.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: While the statement below in red, which we are sending out on all our literature, has to do with people who are running for election this year, the matter referred to, as you are well aware, could be adjusted during the present session, and I think everything should be done to change the law so that any reduction in tariffs should be subject to the ratification of the United States Senate.

Producers of farm products are interested in getting at least cost of production for what they raise rather than having the cost of what they buy reduced. In general, they are fair-minded and are willing to let the manufacturer get a price for what he sells that will allow them to pay a fair wage, so the laborer can afford to pay a fair price for what he consumes in the way of food.

Foreign countries can produce, on account of cheap labor, much cheaper than we can and we all should be for our own citizens first. We should do everything we can to create jobs and create an incentive, if possible, for people to work with a view of taking care of themselves not only at present but provide also something for the future.

I hope you agree and vote accordingly when this comes up this session.

Your very truly,

N. B. UPDIKE.

In the coming elections we all should vote for candidates, regardless of party, who believe in the American market for American farm products—at least until the domestic market reaches cost of production. Also we should vote for candidates who believe that any reciprocal tariff should be confirmed by the Senate before becoming effective.

LIBERTY, MO., March 6, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A few nights ago I heard you speak on the radio against the reciprocal trade treaty bill, and I just wondered if you had a copy of the above-mentioned speech, and if so may I have a copy of the same as I heartily agree with what you have to say.

I am just a Missouri farmer and a small-town merchant, and I know that there is something wrong with agriculture, and know by letting more agricultural products come into this country free it will not make prices any better.

It looks to me as if the New Deal was determined on putting low prices into effect so as to furnish the city population food at a cheaper price, not withstanding they say they want to raise farm products. In other words they could stall 20,000,000 farmers to sleep with the soil-conservation subsidy, and another fool thing they do to furnish food cheaper to a hundred million people in the cities. Then it will gradually work in the trade treaties, and would have free trade rearing to go on farm products.

With best wishes, I remain,

Yours truly,

HARRY L. BOGGESS.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Care of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: May we urge that you use your best efforts toward amending the Trade Agreements Act, now before the Senate, so as to prohibit any reduction in excise taxes provided by Congress.

In passing this act, the House seems to have followed the New Deal trend, whereby Representatives, elected by the people, delegate their job to others not so elected. We are hoping that this bill will meet with a more determined opposition in the upper House.

Thanking your for past favors, we are,

Yours very truly,

WELLS W. MILLER, Treasurer.

EAST OTTO, N. Y., March 8, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: As chairman of an organized group of dairymen numbering nearly 700 members of Cattaraugus County, N. Y., I wish to express to you what I feel to be the majority opinion of farmers with which I come in personal contact.

It is the belief of many farmers that all reciprocal-trade agreements be made with the consent of the Senate, so that their elected representatives may have an opportunity of knowing the content of such agreements and of voicing their own opinions regarding them.

Statistics show that our agricultural exports are decreasing and that our agricultural imports are increasing.

Almost twice as many cattle have been imported into our country from Mexico and Canada this past year as compared with the year before.

Some 80,000,000 pounds of canned beef have been imported from South America in a single year.

We are of the opinion that such imports have a depressing effect on the cattle industry in our own State.

May I personally add that as a dairy farmer of New York State I am in favor of all reciprocal-trade agreements being made as a result of Senate ratification?

Such action, I am sure, would materially improve the dairy-cattle and dairy-products market situation in our State.

May I, therefore, respectfully request that you do everything possible within the power of your office to bring about Senate ratification of such trade agreements?

Thanking you for your interest and cooperation, I am,

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM E. MAIER,
County President, Dairymen's League Cooperative Association.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: Thank you for your letter of March 15, in which you stated that you were working and voting for Senate rejection or ratification of any future trade treaties.

While attending my Grange a few nights ago I was authorized, as chairman of Mansfield Grange, No. 1039, New York State legislative committee, to express to you their appreciation of your position in this matter, which is so vital to the farmers of our Nation.

It was also unanimously voted that the following resolution be sent to you:

"Whereas at present the reciprocal-trade agreements are made by the State Department without Senate ratification; and

"Whereas our agricultural exports are decreasing and our agricultural imports are increasing, to the disadvantage of the American farmer: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the members of Subordinate Grange No. 1039, known as Mansfield Grange, of New York State, do hereby express our opposition to this present manner of trade negotiation; and be it further

"Resolved, That we are strongly in favor of making such trade agreements in a manner which will allow for Senate rejection or Senate ratification of any and all future trade treaties."

THOMAS E. DEWEY

Mr. THOMAS of Utah obtained the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, this morning's Associated Press report, carried in the Washington Post, contains an attack by Mr. Thomas E. Dewey—I believe that is the name [laughter]—on the foreign policy of the United States and of the present administration.

Except for the fact that Mr. Dewey is a candidate for the nomination for President on the Republican ticket, this would not be worthy of comment. I quote from the dispatch:

St. Louis, March 27. Thomas E. Dewey declared tonight the first need of the country is an administration which can be trusted "to keep this Nation out of war."

The youthful New York County district attorney, who seeks the Republican Presidential nomination, charged in a speech that "failure has followed every step" of the New Deal, "because underlying all its policies there has been a fundamental lack of integrity—a cynical disregard for the principles of common honesty."

The article is quite lengthy. I ask unanimous consent to have the entire article printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of March 28, 1940]

DEWEY ASSAILS FOREIGN POLICY OF ROOSEVELT—G. O. P. CANDIDATE TELLS MISSOURIANS NEW DEAL MAY NOT AVOID WAR

ST. LOUIS, March 27.—Thomas E. Dewey declared tonight the first need of the country is an administration which can be trusted "to keep this Nation out of war."

The youthful New York County district attorney, who seeks the Republican Presidential nomination, charged in a speech that "failure has followed every step" of the New Deal, "because underlying all its policies there has been a fundamental lack of integrity—a cynical disregard for the principles of common honesty."

PROMISES BROKEN, HE SAYS

"This lack of integrity is shown in three principal ways—broken promises, contempt for the Constitution, and flagrant abuse of power," he said.

"So what faith can we place in any promise by this administration to keep this Nation out of war?"

Dewey's address was the first in a series on "the moral issues" of the campaign, which he will continue in Chicago tomorrow night. It was given before a meeting sponsored by the Missouri State Republican committee and was broadcast over a Nation-wide hookup.

"I do not need to tell you that the spoken word and the public pledge of this administration are worthless," he declared.

"The erosion of character * * * began within 6 weeks after it took office. It has continued ever since, wearing away the foundations of governmental integrity."

CHARGES "BAD FAITH"

Claiming the New Deal's "record of incompetence and bad faith" had retarded recovery, Dewey asserted:

"The New Deal attempts to elevate its failure into the realm of high economic policy."

He accused the administration of trying to "excuse reckless spending by claiming it is necessary for relief and recovery.

"But even the alibi is false. It is false because, after eliminating every relief and recovery item, the cost of the National Government under the New Deal has gone up $225,000,000,000, or 56 percent."

SEES "STOP DEWEY" MOVE

Earlier in an interview Dewey expressed the view that both President Roosevelt and Vice President Garner have joined a "stop Dewey" movement.

Questioned regarding Mr. Roosevelt's statement that Dewey should be the Republicans' choice for Vice President, he replied one of his aides had made the proper comment: "Roosevelt has joined the 'stop Dewey' movement."

Vice President Garner's name came up in connection with Dewey's remarks on the primary April 2 in Wisconsin, where he and United States Senator ARTHUR E. VANDENBERG, of Michigan, are contesting for the Wisconsin delegation to the party's national convention.

He asserted he had been informed Garner headquarters had sent 500,000 letters to Wisconsin automobile owners urging them to vote for Garner if they were Democrats and for VANDENBERG if they were Republicans. This he characterized as additional evidence of a "stop Dewey" movement.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not care to comment, except to say that the best answer to Mr. Dewey when he says that we need an administration which can be trusted to keep the Nation out of war is that we have already kept the Nation out of war. I do not know where Mr. Dewey was during the last special session of the Congress when we spent something like 6 weeks legislating for the very purpose of keeping the Nation out of war. We have kept the Nation out of war without any assistance from Mr. Dewey. Since that legislation was enacted, not a single American ship on the high seas has been sunk, and, so far as I know, not a single American citizen has lost his life on the high seas from the action of any belligerent nation.

What is wrong with that policy? What is it that Mr. Dewey wants to do about it? What more could America do than we have already done, when we made the greatest national sacrifice in the history of the world by taking our commerce out of every port in a belligerent country, off many of the great sea lanes, and out of combat zones which may be delimited by Presidential proclamation? What is it that Mr. Dewey wants done? How does he propose to keep the Nation out of war?

Mr. President, Mr. Dewey's speech is an assault on the United States Senate and the House of Representatives, and on many members of his own party. However, we cannot blame Mr. Dewey. He is running for office. We can talk about paralysis agitans, locomotor ataxia, creeping sickness, and all the other debilitating ailments, but if the little virulent Presidential bee ever stings a small-bore, young hopeful, he gets them all at once. [Laughter.] It destroys his vision, his perspective, and his outlook; and the hunger for place, the hunger for office, impairs his vision, and causes a readjustment of all his former normal functions.

So Mr. Dewey is running for President—that is, he thinks he is! I think he is laboring under a delusion. He thinks he is running, but he is not. [Laughter.] He attacks the integrity of the administration—I suppose about foreign affairs, because what he is attacking is foreign policy.

This lack of integrity is shown in three principal ways—broken promises, contempt for the Constitution, and flagrant abuse of power.

Where is the foreign nation which can say to the United States that it has broken its promise? We are now talking about foreign relations. Why does not Mr. Dewey, with his little army of investigators—his Ogpu—point out wherein we have broken our promise to a foreign nation? We have kept the faith, and that is one of the reasons why we are not in the war. That is one of the reasons why we are not going to get into the war.

America has been true to its international obligations. We are now debating legislation involving international relations. If the United States makes promises to foreign nations, I, among other Senators, want the United States to live up to those obligations.

Dewey's address was the first in a series on "the moral issues" of the campaign which he will continue in Chicago tomorrow night.

Chicago is a good place to pursue moral issues. [Laughter.] He is to pursue those issues in Chicago tonight.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Is he going into Texas after he leaves Chicago?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think he will go to Texas, because he is looking for votes which can be obtained, and I understand that all the Republican votes in Texas have already been secured in advance for one of the candidates through a little business arrangement which has already been made.

Let us see about the "moral issues."

It was given before a meeting sponsored by the Missouri State Republican Committee and was broadcast over a Nation-wide hook-up.

I do not need to tell you that the spoken word and the public pledge of this administration are worthless—

He declared.

Mr. President, those are baseless and unfounded charges. Who is Mr. Dewey that he should pass on moral issues or on the integrity of this or any other administration?

He did not think this administration was so bad when in 1935 he accepted a job under it. I hold in my hand a copy of Who's Who in America, and I know the reference to him is correct because he gave it in himself, I suppose as a part of his life history. Here it is:

Special Assistant to United States Attorney General for prosecution of tax proceedings against Charles E. Mitchell and criminal prosecution of Irving Wexler alias Waxey Gordon, 1934–35.

If this is such a corrupt administration, if it will not keep its word, if it violates its pledges and commits all the other sins, why would this Mr. Dewey, standing on moral issues, accept a job under the Attorney General? That is what he did. I do not think he kept it long. He was out some time back, and I imagine that it was not his willingness to get out that lost him the job.

Special assistant to the United States Attorney General, * * * 1934–35.

He was holding another job at the same time—on moral issues, I suppose—two jobs at once and two salaries at once in 1934–35.

Mr. President, about all I have to say is that such irresponsible and foolish charges are not apt to contribute to the dignity or the moral sublimation of the Presidential campaign.

Mr. Dewey ought not to be running for President; he ought to be running for county attorney in some small New York county; that is about the level of that sort of campaign.

Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator from Utah for indulging me these remarks. I would not have asked him to yield, but I know that he sympathizes with the attitude I am undertaking to express, because he was one of the strong influences and forces in the Foreign Relations Committee which hammered out the neutrality bill, which the Congress enacted, and which the President signed.

I wonder where Mr. Dewey was during that time? If, as he, in effect, states, he was against the Neutrality Act, why did he not say so then instead of waiting 3 or 4 months to come out of hiding in New York and tell us where he stood then?

My attention has just been called also to an article on Mr. Dewey in the Daily News of today by Mr. Raymond Clapper, a very pungent and capable correspondent. The only regret about this kind of thing and the necessity of writing an editorial or article or making a speech about Mr. Dewey is that it gives him publicity. That is what he wants; that is what he is after; but every good deed has some countervailing reaction that does not always contribute to the public welfare, and that is one of them.

Mr. President, I should like to have unanimous consent, even at the cost of further advertising a rather shoddy piece of political merchandise, to have the article by Mr. Clapper printed in the RECORD. I thank the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News, of March 28, 1940]

OFF THE DEEP END

(By Raymond Clapper)

In his St. Louis speech, Thomas E. Dewey makes the gravest charge that has been laid at the door of the Roosevelt administration.

"Underlying all its policies," said Mr. Dewey, "there has been a fundamental lack of integrity—a cynical disregard of the principles of common honesty."

Who are some of these policy-making people in this administration who so glaringly lack integrity and common honesty? Cordell Hull? Henry Morgenthau? Harry Woodring? Robert Jackson? James A. Farley? Charles Edison? Harold Ickes? Henry A. Wallace? Harry Hopkins? Frances Perkins?

Are they the ones Mr. Dewey says are lacking in integrity and common honesty? Evidently he has had no contact with any of them. They can be criticized for many errors of judgment but not for lack of integrity. In some 20 years here I have seen several batches of Cabinet officers, going back to Harding's time. For integrity and honesty of purpose I'll put this Cabinet against any that has been in Washington since the war. It is the one thing that does truly distinguish this group. There is not a shady one in the lot. Some of them may be too idealistic. Some of them may be impractical. Some of them may be too stubborn. But that these Cabinet members are lacking in moral fiber, in "fundamental integrity" or in "common honesty" is something that not even a district attorney can demonstrate.

Go down the line to some of the lower-ranking policy-making officials. Who are the ones there lacking in integrity and common honesty? Aubrey Williams of N. Y. A.? Thurman Arnold? Jerome Frank and Leon Henderson, of S. E. C.? Sumner Welles and Adolf Berle? Eccles? Henry Grady? Steve Early?

Average up the Roosevelt crew and the one thing that does mark it is the exceptional devotion to the general ideals of the New Deal, and the incorruptibility of the group as a whole. Judge these men by political standards and that is the one thing that stands out in their favor. If any of them are ever caught handling little black bags, I'll be amazed. Republicans ought to be cautious about bringing up a subject that recalls so much history.

Mr. Dewey attempts to peg his case on such circumstances as Mr. Roosevelt's failure to carry out his 1932 economy pledge and his abandonment of the gold standard.

In his first Presidential campaign Mr. Roosevelt definitely promised a 25-percent cut in Government expenses. It was a foolish campaign pledge because it was an impossible promise. Whether Mr. Roosevelt knew it at the time, I don't know, and I doubt if Mr. Dewey does.

At any rate, after he went into office Mr. Roosevelt began slashing expenses. He cut veterans' allowances. But there were millions out of work and something had to be done. The Federal Government started spending money. With that the pressure in Congress to restore the veterans' cuts became irresistible. In the summer of 1932, many thought that the worst of the depression was over.

But you remember February and March of 1933. Conditions were infinitely worse. If the Republicans had been in office, they would, I hope, have done about what the Roosevelt administration did. They would have faced the situation and done the necessary thing. I hope Mr. Dewey doesn't mean that in view of his pledges of economy he would refuse to approve more expenditures if he should enter the White House and find that business had collapsed, as it did under Mr. Hoover.

Mr. Dewey is talking with his tongue in his cheek. If he became President he would try to meet the problems that faced him and he wouldn't be stopping to thumb back over his campaign speeches, I hope. He would, I believe, be statesman enough to brush aside the past and wade into the job with whatever was required. Every man of affairs, who has been responsible for the success of large enterprises, knows what I am talking about and so does Mr. Dewey.

Integrity in public life means the higher integrity of fidelity to the best interests of the country. If that requires a public official to forget something he said when he didn't know any better, he had better forget it and the quicker the better. You can't walk backward, reading old campaign speeches, and be a good President.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, before starting my discussion I must, by way of introduction, call attention to the fact that the two underlying topics for discussion in the treatment of the pending amendment are the Constitution of the United States and the history of tariffs in the United States. United States history can very properly be written around the history of tariffs, because, in the setting up of our Government, tariff legislation became part of our scheme of things, and, of course, it has remained with us ever since.

In considering the tariff in any phase one must always take into consideration the fact that it has many complications, and deals with many different subjects. It has the aspects of a revenue law; it has the aspects of a law to control commerce within and to curb commerce without It has, therefore, its international ramifications, and, when we take into consideration all these facts, we discover that when we start to consider any of these acts from a purely constitutional standpoint we find ourselves lost in a labyrinth which almost covers the whole of our Constitution.

I have accepted in my remarks the theory about the tariff and the theory about the Constitution which accepts them both as nonstatic. Both are growing, both react to conditions from within, and both must necessarily react to conditions from without.

When it comes to the Constitution, in order to determine what our Constitution may mean today, we cannot consider the instrument just as it was written; we have to take into consideration all the laws made in conformity to it, all the amendments, the legal interpretations, and the administrative interpretations. We have to get even further than that and take into consideration the practices of our Government growing out of expediency and necessity, practices which are extra constitutional and also extra legal in their aspects.

When one starts to consider a particular subject with this type of background, he must lay his foundation, then, in regard to interpretation of what the Constitution means, in a way consistent with 150 years of growth and development through which our country has passed. There was a time when our Constitution seemed to be merely a document based upon almost a law of physics, emphasizing all the time the balance-of-power notion—the theory of three coordinate and distinct powers or departments of our Government each checking the others. It is quite natural that those persons who lived in the time of the notion in regard to physical science which had its basis in balance should accept a political concept and a legal document on the basis of physical facts because, whether we like it or not, we interpret all that we do in a social way and all that we do in a political way on the basis of physical facts. We can never get away from that. Then, when the world carried forward the idea of progress and evolution, making out of those two concepts a philosophy of life and a philosophy of understanding, laws and constitutions naturally fell into step, and the Constitution of the United States was interpreted, thought of, and considered as a great growing organism, a moving-onward body, as it were—something alive, something vital; it was interpreted in that way for a great number of years, and it must be so because it is a guide to human beings and their welfare.

So I say, in the very beginning, that my constitutional approach is a simple one. I do not accept the Constitution merely as a physical fact or as a growing organism, but I do not discount those two interpretations of the legal fact. They are there, but the Constitution of the United States is something in addition to this. Today I think most people will agree with me that this document, which now is the oldest of all constitutions in the world—this document which set up the one technique of government which seems to be the only technique which can save the world from chaos and ruin—the federal technique—must mean to all persons who are thoughtful about it merely the companion of the American people in the accomplishment of their political and social aims. Therefore it grows with us, and we grow and develop with it, and the tariff has done exactly the same thing. It has reacted to needs from within; it has reacted to necessity from without; and in the story of the evolution of our tariff, which I hope to be able to give, I want all who are kind enough to listen to me to realize that this fundamental notion is in the back of my head when I give the incidents of growth and development. The present condition of our tariff technique, our reciprocal conventions, our reciprocal agreements, are in very deed an evolution growing out of the necessity of the times and the way in which conditions have turned to make these things necessary.

Therefore, my remarks may be considered academic, but I trust that they will not be academically or even constitutionally useless. My remarks may enter into a field that I am not prepared to go into, because I am not a lawyer; but I have tried to sum up in a short space some of the results of the decisions which have affected our tariff laws, so that readers who are legally minded may, if they wish, follow through the argument in a logical way.

The constitutional arguments presented by those who favor the amendment calling for ratification of the reciprocal-trade pacts by the Senate turn upon the following:

That the pacts are treaties in the sense that the word "treaty" is used in article II and article VI of the Constitution;

That the pacts constitute a modification of a revenue law; and

That, if these two assumptions are admitted, the governmental technique outlined in the Constitution governing the ratification of treaties and the enacting of revenue laws must be followed.

Since the pending joint resolution had its origin in the House of Representatives and has gone forward in accordance with constitutional practice for revenue bills, this phase of the argument is only contributory to the theory that those in charge of the joint resolution have considered it a revenue measure. This point, then, does not constitute an issue so far as the constitutionality of the act which will expire on June 12 is concerned. If, though, the pacts are treaties, as the word "treaty" is used in articles II and VI of the Constitution, the present law must be considered unconstitutional, and its renewal without amendment will lay the law open to a constitutional test. That, of course, would mean, if the contention were sustained in the courts, that no more reciprocal-trade pacts could be consummated without further legislation. The question of the continuing validity of the present pacts might also be challenged. This may be termed a literalist attitude from a constitutional standpoint.

With this attitude I am in complete disagreement.

I maintain that the present law is constitutional; that the existing reciprocal-trade pacts have met the technique consistent with the fundamental practices of our Government, and that the present act and pending joint resolution need not conform with those parts of our Constitution wherein treaties are mentioned in article II and article VI, but are in complete conformity with the powers delegated to Congress for control of interstate and foreign commerce. Since this power granted Congress in the first article is complete and all-embracing, and since throughout our history tariff acts have been primarily for purposes of developing or controlling commerce and only secondarily for purposes of revenue, the constitutional power under article I is sufficient.

For these and other reasons, I am opposed to what I have termed the strict constructionist approach to this constitutional phase of the present discussion. I conceive the problem to be a problem of governmental efficiency, growing out of world conditions as they exist today, and in keeping with an evolutionary development of tariff practices. The question is one of governmental policy, not a problem of law. If I thought the question were one of ceding over from Congress, or a representative body of Congress, such as the Senate, to the Executive the final word as the policy-forming institution of our Government, I should accept the arguments of the Senators from Nevada and Wyoming, and make a point in support of their stands.

Under the joint resolution, however, Congress does not give up its ultimate rights. Much has been said here about the delegation of power and the delegation of authority. The last case I remember in which a law was stricken down by the Supreme Court of the United States because legislative power was delegated was the one involving the "hot oil" law. In that case the reason which caused the Court to make its decision turned upon the simple fact that the law did not contain the contingency under which the Executive was to act. By a simple amendment adopted by Congress this defect was overcome, and the control under that act is still carried on by our Executive.

If it is a contingency which must control the actions of the Executive when power is delegated under administrative theory, one need but turn to the act itself which, incidentally, has not in and of itself had a constitutional test and find not one paragraph laying down a contingency, not two paragraphs laying down limitations and contingencies, but six paragraphs outlining contingencies, making limitations and curbing the power of the Executive in regard to entering into reciprocal-trade pacts. Time limits are put there. Certain articles cannot be considered unless under certain arrangements. So every condition which the Court insisted upon, so far as the delegation of authority to the Executive was concerned, has been met in the act; and, as we point out further, the "hot oil" case had to do with internal affairs, affairs in which the Executive in and of himself had no power, no independent field of activity. We can see how completely careful and how thoroughly consistent with the evolutionary growth of our tariff legislation the framers of the Reciprocal Tariff Act were, and, if we may judge from the decision of the Supreme Court in regard to the "hot oil" cases and if we may adopt the theory that the contingency and the limitation is the proper curbing for the Executive, how almost foolproof from a standpoint of law the present Reciprocal Tariff Act is.

But under the joint resolution Congress does not give up its ultimate right. The trade pacts and the right to negotiate the trade pacts and bring them into operation are temporary. This fact must be granted whether the pacts themselves are deemed valid or invalid. It is quite clear that the reciprocal-trade agreements do not constitute a forbidden delegation in the constitutional sense. It has been found in the operation of government that we cannot continue to function without, from time to time, asking others to execute the will of Congress by filling in the details, however many and however important, to satisfy a broad policy set by Congress.

Mr. President, I need not and I will not repeat what the Senator from Georgia said in regard to this question yesterday, but I wish to say that whenever anyone starts talking about the separation of powers and the coordinated branches of our Government, he almost invariably ends up with using a series of words and a series of sentences which make one feel that we have three governments and not one Government. We have only one Government. Sometimes the Executive speaks for that Government, sometimes the courts speak for that Government, sometimes the legislature speaks for that Government. When we talk about powers, they are all delegated, and they are powers merely to act for the one single Government under our constitutional scheme.

I think it should be emphasized all the time that there is only one Government of the United States. It matters not how big or how little the administrative officer is, when he speaks in the name of the Government of the United States that is his authority, and he represents the Government of the United States when he speaks.

The Senate, of course, is not abdicating by not insisting on ratifying trade pacts, pact by pact, any more than Congress gave up when it permitted the Executive to alter by 50 percent any existing rate or duty on importations, or when it left to a commission the involved question of freight rates to meet complicated and ever-changing situations.

It is refreshing to hear constitutional arguments raised at this late day, so long after the act has been applied, certainly long after any aggrieved party might have been heard and his plea settled before the highest tribunal. Certainly the question is not whether we may or not, but whether we should or not. The economics of the situation, or, as I stated in the beginning, the question of governmental policy, not of lawful authority, confronts us.

The constitutional facts must not be overlooked. Powers granted the Executive under article II in regard to treaties make the Executive the initiator and the negotiator. The Senate's giving its advice and consent is a completing act.

Still, the whole act is not completed, and since arguments about article VI have been presented, with reference to a treaty becoming the supreme law of the land, let me point out that, while under our scheme of government the legislative authority in Congress is all-embracing, with the exception of the recommendations of the President, or the veto of the President, or the approval of the President, when it comes to treaties there is another element which enters into the making of the supreme law of the land. That element has nothing to do with any of the authorities under the Constitution of the United States. No treaty goes into effect until it becomes an agreement between two nations, and it is very interesting to know that if we accept the theory that a treaty is a law of the United States, the antecedents to making a treaty the law of the United States were not only the executive acts and the legislative acts, but actually foreign acts. That is how broad our constitutional scheme is, and that is one fact about article VI which is not generally pointed out—that in the making of the supreme law of the land of the United States, foreign governments actually have a part.

I bring this suggestion before my colleagues now so that I may follow along the theory announced by the Senator from Georgia yesterday—the theory in regard to treaties, and why the President has an all-embracing power in the initiation, the negotiation, and the revocation of treaties—because when it comes to foreign relations, the power is vested in a single authority, the United States, and the giving of assent, the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, is only one of the elements which make a treaty a law.

Even after the advice and consent are given, the publication of a treaty is necessary, the acceptance of the treaty by the foreign nation is necessary, and, in addition to that, the registering or the proper placing of the treaty is necessary. That is why the fathers saw and understood so well the difference between municipal law and international law, and that is why, of necessity, when international law is invoked and turned to, the restrictions are stronger than they are in municipal law, because there enters into the arrangement the idea of faith and the necessity of governments, above all things, keeping their word.

Does the Senate here act in a legislative capacity or in an executive capacity? Whether executive or legislative, the two acts are essential to a complete consummation. Still, the treaty would not become a law of the land by just these two acts. For such a treaty to have force, it must also be accepted and put into force by a foreign state over whom we have no legal or executive authority. But that is not the question I wish to emphasize here.

It has been brought out that there is an unlawful delegation of power in granting to the President the authority which he has exercised under the present act. This might be true if the delegation had been a delegation of power over internal affairs, for in that field Congress is definitely supreme, and law governing internal affairs is its complete right, and a delegation of this right might consistently be challenged. But when it comes to external affairs the situation is different. There are inherent in the Executive, under our Constitution, certain rights and powers, and they do not exist in Congress, and are entirely outside of the advice and consent right granted the Senate.

Congressional powers in regard to treaties are not confined to the simple practices outlined in article II. I can conceive of a treaty being initiated as a law of Congress with a rider instructing the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with foreign countries to have such a law passed by the legislative power of other foreign countries and thus bring about a universal law throughout the whole world which would have uniform application upon all persons in the world.

Of course, the President does have the right to accept or reject the obligation to negotiate. This is the practice within our States. This, of course, is a legislative practice, but if it should become a series of international acts, it might follow all the force and technique of a treaty. To assume, then, that Congress cannot initiate would be an assumption going too far. Yet, I do not offer this as being strictly germane to the present question. It merely illustrates the fact that treaty-making power may be extremely complex without being unconstitutional, and may or may not follow the simple technique as outlined in article II.

The pending resolution gives us an opportunity to review the fundamentals which were undoubtedly in the minds of the founding fathers when our Constitution was set up. Jefferson stated so well this problem, or rather, problems, for there were two. We had first to make one government out of many, and then make that one function as a unit through a separation of governmental activities. In a letter to Madison at the end of 1786, Jefferson wrote:

> To make us one nation as to foreign concerns, and keep us distinct in domestic ones, gives the outlines of the proper division of powers between the general and particular governments. But to enable the Federal head to exercise the powers given it to best advantage, it should be organized as the particular ones are, into legislative, executive, and judiciary.

Probably no other single paragraph had so much to do with confirming the policy of the founding fathers as had that paragraph written by Jefferson.

He had nothing to do with the real writing of the Constitution, because he was not even in this country at the time, but the underlying principles are so well stated in that paragraph that the Constitution of the United States cannot be considered without referring to it.

The arguments of lawyers before the Supreme Court are arguments in favor of particular causes and, therefore, like the arguments advanced by the text writers, are more or less rationalizations rather than statements of historical fact. In the setting up of our Constitution and the bringing into existence of a government with three coordinate branches, the problem which the founding fathers had facing them was one of changing a government wherein the executive, the legislative, and the judicial were united in one body as had become the practice in England, into an institution unified, to be sure, but recognizing a separation of powers. When it came to appointments and to treaty making, the Constitutional Convention did not wish to give over to the Executive complete power in these two great fields. The advice and consent technique, already well established, was resorted to, and instead of allowing the check on the President to remain in the entire Congress, treaty matter was left to the Senate with a necessary two-thirds vote to ratify, while the appointing power was left to a simple majority in the same chamber.

Mr. President, advice and consent in regard to appointments is quite generally meant in our Government, both in theory and practice, to be two separate acts, the Senate or part of the Senate to be, under the Constitution, a party both to advising and consenting. In treaty making the tendency in the development of our processes has been toward considering the process of advice and consent a single act. The President has gained complete power in regard to the initiation and negotiation. While in our Government the policy-forming institution still remains Congress, our Government is not a congressional government but strongly a Presidential one, and due to the growth of our country and to the sheer weight and bulk of our governmental structure, it has become more Presidential as time has passed. The greater number of executive assistants in proportion to legislative persons will bring this about as a matter of quantitative pressure without taking into consideration any of the fundamental powers.

But still America remains a government by law, and all the restraining rights and powers remain in Congress, and so far as treaties and appointments are concerned, they remain with the Senate.

This statement may be taken to be an argument in favor of the contentions of those who raise constitutional doubts in regard to the pending legislation, who maintain that the trade pacts are treaties, and that therefore the Senate must ratify them. If the congressional powers and the senatorial powers had not been expressed this contention might be true. But they have been expressed in the instructions given to the Executive, and in the authority to act, and in the time limit placed upon the act. Therefore the legislative branch of our Government has expressed its will, it has had its opportunity to maintain a check, the judicial branch assumedly has not been resorted to, and the challenge is still open to the aggrieved person or citizen; so that the theory of our Government, based as it is on three coordinate powers offering checks when checks are needed, has been respected.

Of course, an outstanding reason for being opposed to Senate ratification of each trade pact is one of efficiency and expediting of governmental processes, an almost necessary one in its first aspect, and an extremely desirable one in its second. The reciprocal-trade agreements have to do with tariffs. Tariffs were never a matter for the Senate alone, but for the Congress and the Executive. Throughout the whole history of our tariff legislation the primary purpose of tariff has been not a matter of mere taxation for revenue gain but a matter of industrial and business expansion and control of commerce. If this had not been the case the slogan "Tariff for revenue only" would never have been resorted to. The reciprocal-trade pacts have therefore the same purposes. They have their fundamental reason for being in necessity. The old tariff technique of controlling commerce by a unilateral legislative act has become obsolete. Its success for accomplishing the objectives of its sponsors—that is, promotion of domestic industry—was dependent upon a fairly stable world.

Mr. President, the tariff as a medium of aid to home industry was only a valid medium in a world wherein money values and exchange were constant, fluctuating only in fractions of a percentage. The minute the world became a world of commercial and economic chaos as a result of managed currencies, inflated and depreciated coinage, the nonrecognition of our metallic based money, and governmental control by Executive action expressed by subsidy and dumping, the exploitation of cheap labor and the exploitation of backward peoples by controlled values, the stability essential to a true protective tariff establishment was gone. I can use one incident and one commodity to illustrate my point. In 1932 we had a tariff of 2 cents on sugar while foreign sugar was being laid down in the United States at one-half mill a pound. Subsidy, depreciated currency, and the dumping practices of nations had overcome completely the artificial benefit to the domestic producer which our tariff had offered and promised. Therefore as long as the world is as it is and tariffs are changed in other nations by Executive action, almost by edict, America, if she is practical, must meet that situation. Other nations may change the value of the import tax, the amount of subsidy, and the value of money in order to aid their trade, and we find ourselves bound by our law in such a way that these mediums are impossible under our slowly responding governmental structure.

But there is a better reason for the support of the contention that we should continue the technique of our reciprocal-trade pacts as they now are carried on by our State Department. Tariff duty is a matter, after all, which affects both the country which invokes it and the country whose trade might be influenced by it. Thus in its final analysis, in its most friendly and businesslike aspects, a tariff is bilateral, and under our present theory of the most-favored-nation clause it may be multilateral. For business relations to be good, both the buyer and the seller must enjoy benefits. An opportunity has been created whereby nations might be benefited. Reciprocal-trade agreements can be worked out to the advantage of all concerned, through the process of hearings before committees representing both countries parties to the pact. The technique of negotiation cannot help but make for better understanding and ultimately better and more stable business conditions because the representatives of each government must know that the pacts must stand for the benefit of both, and that the loopholes permitted through the most-favored-nation clause must be curbed to insure no overreaching. Thus we have a technique brought into existence which cannot help but improve relations, improve industry and trade, and result in the stabilization of that industry and trade. Therefore, I do not think that the strict constructionist constitutional approach should prevail, and, therefore, I maintain that the practice is an evolution of Hamilton's original tariff theory, the promotion of industry and the control of trade.

The reciprocal-trade agreements, when viewed in the light of our tariff history, mark this evolution, not a startling change in method. This country long ago rebelled against the old inflexible tariff. It set up not only the flexible tariff theory wherein the Executive was given authority to change the tariff to the extent of 50 percent, after study, but Congress actually set up a Tariff Commission to aid in these studies and help accomplish the flexing.

These things all happened when the world was in a condition more stable than it is today. Still the need was so apparent that the flexible tariff right was retained even in our last tariff act, and the Commission is still functioning, assisting properly by doing its part in furnishing studies and advice to the Executive in the negotiation of reciprocal pacts. Viewed in this light, then, the reciprocal-trade pact is a growing aspect of an evolutionary tendency. To stop it or make this tendency ineffective by permitting one-third of the Senate of the United States by vote, or less by filibuster, to overcome the studied conclusions of our Tariff Commission, our negotiators, our State Department advisors, would be a step backward to such an extent that we would multiply chaos not only in our own industry but also in the industry in much of the world. When the flexible tariff came into existence its opponents pointed out that Congress was giving up some of its powers, that Executive authority was being expanded. One does not wish to argue that point, but the powers between the executive, the legislative, and the judicial are not in an even and a constant balance. If they were we would have a government by mathematical equations instead of by law. The powers executed or expressed are always a matter of degree. One time Congress may have its last word and that last word may be important; it may be comparatively insignificant. So with the President. At all times the judiciary may seem to have the last word, and here again it might be on a matter of utter insignificance, or on a matter which actually strikes down going agencies of government and causes a remaking of institutions. Events, not mathematics, shape their comparative strengths. When called upon to function, each rises so nobly to its task that we are constrained never to say again that one is impotent, and that we do not have a true separation as well as a true coordination among the three branches of government.

We are coming to the belief that "coordinate branches" is a term which suggests that they coordinate in the cooperative sense, and that friction, far from being an essential to good American government, is not an encourageable quality.

Mr. President, in summing up the whole question I have attempted to show, as I said in the beginning, the growth, evolution, and development, both in tariff practices and in constitutional interpretations and practices.

The President's authority under reciprocal-trade agreements is a natural outgrowth of executive control over foreign commerce; that is, Executive control when such grant has been given to the Executive by Congress.

The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of June 12, 1934, was a natural outgrowth of the experiences of the Congress, the President, and the Tariff Commission in dealing with our tariff problems under those provisions of the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930.

The tariff problems are too numerous and too complicated to handle without a continuing body like the Tariff Commission to keep abreast of conditions of our foreign trade, and to report those conditions to the Congress and to the President.

The Congress cannot keep the tariff changes abreast of rapidly changing emergency conditions such as we have suffered since the World War, and especially since the last great depression of 1929–30.

Here let me again revert to what I have said in regard to the bilateral nature of the reciprocal-trade theory and of our tariff evolution, and the necessity for it. Again we emphasize causes, again we emphasize depreciated currencies, and again we emphasize the utter independence of governments acting quickly for their own advantage and for their own purpose, upsetting the even tenor and the stable condition of trade. When we enter into a pact with a foreign country we bind that country, and therefore such things are not resorted to. So the stabilizing influence is not one-sided. It is not only for our benefit, but it actually contributes to a stabilizing influence throughout the world.

Both political parties have found it wise and practical to put in the hands of the President power to make changes in tariff rates to meet emergency conditions—the Republicans under the flexible provisions of the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930, and the Democrats under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Amendment or Act of 1934.

Now let us examine what, if any, are the differences in fact and principle in these delegations of authority to the President. If, for example, there is no difference, then, as the other acts have been questioned in the courts and not found wanting, the present act cannot be pointed out as being wanting in that regard.

In accordance with the flexible provisions which have been declared constitutional by unanimous decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Hampton & Co. v. United States (276 U. S. 394), the President changes rates of duty on the basis of the differences in costs of production of articles in the United States and in the principal competing foreign countries; and in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act the President changes the rates upon the basis of his finding as a fact that "duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States," and that the purpose of the Trade Agreements Act will be promoted by the means used in the trade agreements. Two limitations are placed upon the President; and the Executive is always the judge as to whether or not those limitations are present. He acts in accordance with his own finding, and in accordance with his own judgment.

The powers of the President under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act differ, if at all, only in degree rather than in kind from powers which have long been his and which have been declared constitutional in many decisions of the courts, including the recent Hampton decision declaring constitutional the flexible provisions of the act of 1922.

The first act passed by the United States Congress was the Tariff Act of July 4, 1789, which stated its objectives in the preamble, as follows:

SECTION 1. Whereas it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the 1st day of August next ensuing, the several duties hereinafter mentioned shall be laid on the following goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, that is to say:

The commodities and the respective duties are then listed.

Thus we see that the very first act was a complicated act, having many objectives.

The first tariff law was frankly a protective-tariff measure.

Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, in his report on manufactures in 1791, in which he advocated the encouragement of industries in the United States by the use of protective tariffs as adopted in the act of 1789, said:

In order to a better judgment of the means proper to be resorted to by the United States, it will be of use to advert to those which have been employed with success in other countries.

Recognizing that the tariff with us was not new in the sense that we had no experience with it in other places, and recognizing the fact that we took the theories from other places.

The principal of these are:

Protecting duties, or duties on those foreign articles which are the rivals of the domestic ones intended to be encouraged.

Duties of this nature evidently amount to a virtual bounty on the domestic fabrics, since by enhancing the charges on foreign articles they enable the national manufacturers to undersell all their foreign competitors. The propriety of this species of encouragement need not be dwelt upon, as it is not only a clear result from the numerous topics which have been suggested, but is sanctioned by the laws of the United States in a variety of instances; it has the additional recommendation of being a resource of revenue. Indeed, all the duties imposed on imported articles, though with an exclusive view to revenue, have the effect in contemplation; and, except where they fall on raw materials, wear a beneficent aspect toward the manufactures of the country.

From that day to this, our tariffs have been more than mere revenue measures. They have been measures for the regulation of our foreign commerce. In the protective-tariff system itself lie the seeds of the future growth of the regulation of our foreign trade, first by Congress and the Executive in passing and signing the tariff acts, and then by Congress making the standard for adjustment and authorizing the Executive to adjust the rates according to the standard.

This first Tariff Act of 1789 was rather simple and direct so far as rates were concerned. Specific rates were fixed on most items, but on some ad valorem rates were specified. The total number of articles on which rates were levied was small compared with the many thousands covered by the last tariff act; and the revenue of $4,399,000 collected in 1791 was surely not large if compared with the present annual collections of $400,000,000 to $600,000,000 from customs duties on imports.

From the first tariff act until 1922, although the rates in effect during all that period were more or less protective of domestic industries, and the Republican tariffs especially were levied for the encouragement and protection of domestic industries, yet no other act stated that purpose as an objective to be obtained by the rates fixed.

That is, the objectives stated in the first tariff act seem to have been taken for granted, and were not repeated. Probably there are other reasons. We can all conceive of various reasons for leaving those things out. In the acts of 1922 and 1930, however, it was again frankly stated that one of the purposes of those acts was to encourage and to protect domestic labor, industry, and agriculture, moving the acts very widely away from purely revenue purposes and bringing them definitely into the field of domestic and foreign commerce.

Ever since the first tariff act was passed to meet the then existing conditions of our international trade, the Congress has been compelled intermittently to consider, reconsider, and revise our tariff laws to meet the ever-changing and increasingly complex conditions of foreign trade.

As our trade with other countries grew and expanded, Congress found itself unable to keep advised of conditions as they changed to meet competition without frequent hearings on tariff bills to obtain information on frequently proposed tariff changes. In such hearings, interested parties presented their cases for and against proposed changes in the customs rates. Members of the Committee on Ways and Means in the House and of the Finance Committee in the Senate often were not able to tell what the facts really were, because of the partisan character of the data presented by the interested parties at such hearings.

In other words, we did not sit down and think out the scheme of a Tariff Commission. The Tariff Commission was imposed upon the Congress of the United States as a matter of necessity. We did not sit down and think of the Reciprocal Tariff Act, but conditions in the world imposed it upon the Congress of the United States in meeting the world situation in regard to trade. Our reciprocal-trade agreements come about exactly in the same way, out of necessity. I do not think I have to cite the necessity, in a proper clause of the Constitution, for giving a grant. Where is the grant? It is, of course, in the Congress of the United States, if we wish to go into the constitutional phases of the question.

Their need for reliable data upon which to base their conclusions—that is, the conclusions of the two committees—resulted in the organization of the bipartisan Tariff Commission under the act of September 16, 1916. Since then the Commission, a purely fact-finding body, has served the Congress and the President well by furnishing them with the facts about imports, domestic production, competition, comparability, costs, prices, and other advantages and disadvantages in competition. This factual information has been a great help to the Congress in passing on the tariff questions with a more reasonable and enlightened judgment.

This step taken to have a body of tariff experts aid Congress in obtaining the facts was one of several steps leading to the present Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

Once this Commission had been established, the value of its work demonstrated to the Congress on the wisdom of its establishment proved, it was only natural that the Congress should use it further whenever its services could be utilized to advantage in dealing with the constantly increasing complexity of our tariff problems.

After the World War, when there was a fear of a flood of imports due to sudden changes in exchange rates or to depreciated currencies, the so-called flexible provisions were written into the Tariff Act of 1922 to meet those feared emergencies.

Under the flexible provisions the President was given considerable new authority, the authority to change rates of duty to equalize differences in costs of production here and abroad as found by the investigations of the Tariff Commission. This new authority is contained in section 315 of that act.

It might be well to read from section 316, which has to do with the same matter, and note the theory and note how the evolution of the theory has continued.

SECTION 316. (e) That whenever the existence of any such unfair method or act shall be established to the satisfaction of the President he shall determine the rate of additional duty * * *.

Then continuing:

(f) That whenever the President has reason to believe that any article is offered or sought to be offered for entry into the United States in violation of this section, but has not information sufficient to satisfy him thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon his request in writing, forbid the entry thereof until such investigation as the President may deem necessary shall be completed.

The President in being granted that power back in 1922 was granted power quite as great as any powers granted him in regard to reciprocal-trade pacts, as we can all see.

We might spend time going over other acts, but I am sure they have already been inserted in the RECORD. They point and emphasize the fact that the few grants of power given to the President in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act are limited, that they are based upon contingencies, and are strictly within the right to grant or delegate powers, and that grants in similar fashion were given the Executive in the act of 1922 and before 1934.

The contention that trade agreements are treaties in a constitutional sense, I wish to consider again in a legal way; and here I may say that I am not arguing the case; I am reviewing in two or three pages the results of legal determination in regard to treaties, so that the whole thing may be grasped in a paragraph by those who may wish to read.

From the inception of our present constitutional government the Congress, the courts, and the Executive have recognized that there are several types of international agreements which are not treaties in the constitutional sense. This, of course, the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Wyoming are not contending against; they accept that as a fact. These distinctions were well pointed out by Chief Justice Taney in Holmes v. Jennison (1840) (14 Pet. 540, 571):

The words "agreement" and "compact" cannot be * * * held to mean the same thing as the word "treaty."

A treaty was defined as—

A compact made with a view to the public welfare by the superior power, either for perpetuity or for a considerable time.

The Court further said that—

The compacts which have temporary matters for their object are called agreements, conventions, and pactions.

In other words, it seems almost sure that the writers of the act of 1934 actually had before them this decision, because they put in the time limitation to meet the opinion of a great Supreme Court Justice. This decision may aptly be applied to the Trade Agreements Act, which has been enacted as an emergency measure and which requires that agreements be subject to termination not more than 3 years after they take effect.

That there are compacts not possessing the dignity of a treaty in the constitutional sense which may be authorized by Congress and negotiated and proclaimed by the President was recognized by the Supreme Court in the case of B. Altman & Co. v. United States (224 U. S. 583, 601), involving an agreement made under the authority of section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897. And in the recent case of United States v. Curtiss-Wright (1936) (299 U. S. 304), which was cited by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] yesterday, the Supreme Court made it clear that the Federal Government has as an essential part of its sovereignty "the power to make such international agreements as do not constitute treaties in the constitutional sense."

In Field v. Clerk (1892) (143 U. S. 649, 694) the contention was made that section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1890 delegated to the President treaty-making power. The Court disposed of this point by holding that the trade agreements authorized by the act were not treaties requiring ratifications.

The contention of alleged delegation of legislative authority, which has been mentioned several times, may be summed up by citing legal authority.

It has been charged that prior to the enactment of the Trade Agreements Act there were no precedents for changing import duties by Executive action pursuant to international agreement. This position is predicated upon confusion of differences in detail with differences in principle.

As has been fully pointed out at the hearings before the Finance Committee, the precedents amply sustain the present grant of power to the President. The Dingley Tariff Act of 1897, section 3, recognized the appropriateness of changing tariff duties by Executive proclamation pursuant to international agreement entered into under congressional authority. The fact that this law was limited to specified articles, whereas the Trade Agreements Act is not so limited, is a matter of detail rather than of principle. Section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922 authorized the President to select the articles upon which duties were to be changed. The fact that the initial proceedings under the flexible tariff concerned a cost investigation rather than a trade-agreement negotiation is likewise a difference only in detail and not in principle. Combining the two laws, section 3 of the Dingley Act and the flexible tariff provision, we clearly have precedents for changing duties by Executive agreement and selecting the articles upon which changes are to be made.

The contention has been presented that the case of Field against Clark is no precedent for the Trade Agreements Act. It must be remembered, however, that under the act of 1890 the President did have discretion to find that duties were imposed by foreign countries which were reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, and under the Trade Agreements Act the President is authorized to find that the duties of the United States and of foreign countries are unduly burdening the foreign trade of the United States. Here, again, the difference is one of detail and not of principle.

The ruling of the Supreme Court in Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan (293 U. S. 388) has been presented as authority for requiring a definite standard to be followed by the Executive in carrying out the legislative will. In the Curtiss-Wright case (299 U. S. 304), the Panama Refining Co. case was relied on as support for the contention that the arms embargo law was invalid as a delegation of legislative power; but the Supreme Court rejected the contention, holding that in delegating power to control foreign affairs Congress was not limited to the same degree of exactness as in domestic affairs. On page 320 the following language appears:

It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved.

That the Tariff Act is primarily a regulation of foreign commerce, and only incidentally a revenue measure, was clearly recognized by the Supreme Court in Board of Trustees of the University of Illinois v. United States (289 U. S. 48, 58).

It has been argued that the Curtiss-Wright case is not pertinent to the present consideration because it affected only foreign matters. It is true that the principal purpose of the arms-embargo law was to promote peace in foreign countries. However, the means adopted by Congress to promote such peace was the regulation of foreign trade of the United States, inasmuch as the embargo law did regulate or prohibit the exportation of implements of war, and authorized the President to put the embargo into effect by proclamation predicated on a finding of fact. The Trade Agreements Act likewise is designed to regulate foreign trade. The only difference in principle between it and the arms embargo law upheld in the Curtiss-Wright case is that the Trade Agreements Act takes into consideration two aspects of our foreign trade, namely, imports as well as exports.

By means of citations I should like to show:

First. That the United States customs tariff has been historically a means of commercial control rather than primarily a source of revenue. That I have already partly done.

Second. That it has been necessary, as a historical development, for an increasing Executive control of the tariff to be placed in the hands of the President. That I have already done.

Mr. President, in order that I may not detain the Senate, but that these quotations may appear in the RECORD to make the RECORD complete, as far as the theory of these quotations is concerned, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a quotation from Taussig's Tariff History of the United States; another quotation from Taussig quoting Alexander Hamilton; quotations from George Washington, showing that he was in complete agreement with Hamilton's views; and a quotation from the United States Tariff Commission's Dictionary of Tariff Information, published in 1924.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I. The United States customs tariff has been, historically, a means of commercial control rather than primarily a source of revenue.

Frank W. Taussig, in his Tariff History of the United States, says:

"The first tariff act, that of 1789, was protective in intention and spirit. The Congress of the Confederation had framed a plan for a general 5-percent duty, with a few specific duties on articles like tea, coffee, and sugar—a plan whose failure was one of the most important events leading to the adoption of the Constitution. When Congress met in 1789, this scheme, which had aimed solely at procuring the needed revenues, was presented anew by Madison, who advocated it not only on financial grounds but on the general principles of free trade. But several of the States, especially Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, had imposed protective duties before 1789, and they were desirous of maintaining the aid then given to some of their industries. Moreover, the feeling of resentment against Great Britain was strong. Consequently, Madison's simple proposal was replaced by a more complicated scheme. The general duty of 5 percent was retained on all goods not otherwise enumerated. On certain articles of luxury higher ad valorem rates were fixed, the highest, on carriages, being 15 percent. Specific duties were imposed on some selected articles, such as hemp, cordage, nails, manufactures of iron, and glass. These articles were selected, and made subject to the specific duties, with the clear intent of stimulating domestic production. The general range of duties was by no means such as would have been thought protective in later days, but the intention to protect was there."

Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury in 1789, was a strong believer in the use of the tariff to develop American manufactures. In his report on manufactures, he said:

"The expediency of encouraging manufactures in the United States, which was not long since deemed very questionable, appears at this time to be pretty generally admitted. The embarrassments which have obstructed the progress of our external trade have led to serious reflections on the necessity of enlarging the sphere of our domestic commerce; the restrictive regulations, which, in foreign markets abridge the vent of the increasing surplus of our agricultural produce, serve to beget an earnest desire that a more extensive demand for that surplus may be created at home; and the complete success which has rewarded manufacturing enterprise, in some valuable branches, conspiring with the promising symptoms which attend some less mature essays in others, justify a hope that the obstacles to the growth of this species of industry are less formidable than they were apprehended to be; and that it is not difficult to find, in its further extension, a full indemnification for any external disadvantages which are or may be experienced as well as an accession of resources favorable to national independence and safety."

Washington had fully accepted Hamilton's views, and his messages to Congress urged the encouragement of domestic industries. His letters, too, show what progress had been made in manufactures and what was the feeling in regard to them. A letter to Lafayette, written a few months before the act of 1789 was passed, reflects faithfully the hope and the faith of the time:

"Though I would not force the introduction of manufactures by extravagant encouragement, and to the prejudice of agriculture, yet I conceive much might be done in that way by women, children, and others without taking one really necessary hand from the tilling of the earth. Certain it is, great savings are already made in many articles of apparel, furniture, and consumption. Equally certain it is that no diminution in agriculture has taken place at the time when greater and more substantial improvements in manufactures are making than ever before known in America. In Pennsylvania they have attended particularly to the fabrication of cotton cloths, hats, and all kinds of leather. In Massachusetts they are establishing factories of duck, cordage, glass, and several other useful and extensive branches. The number of shoes made in one town and nails in another is incredible. In that State and Connecticut there are also factories of superfine and other broadcloths. I have been writing to our friend, General Knox, this day, to procure me homespun broadcloth of the Hartford fabric, to make a suit of clothes for myself. I hope it will not be a great while before it will be unfashionable for a gentleman to appear in any other dress. Indeed, we have been too long subject to British prejudices."

To Jefferson he wrote in a similar strain and said: "A desire of encouraging whatever is useful and beneficial seems now generally to prevail." In two letters he suggested to Governor Randolph a plan by which Virginia should increase the raising of sheep and foster the woolen industry. His interest had been aroused and this plan suggested by a tour through the New England States and a sight of what had been accomplished there. He wished his own State to follow the example of Connecticut.

That the tariff was an instrument for commercial control as well as for raising revenue was well brought out in the historic debate on the question of the constitutionality of protection. (U. S. Tariff Commission, Dictionary of Tariff Information, Washington, 1924, p. 177.)

"The principle was first elaborated by Daniel Webster (see) in 1820 that while Congress has a right so to arrange duties for revenue as incidentally to protect manufactures, it has not the right to make protection a leading motive in the forming of a tariff law. It is a question, he said, whether it is not contrary to the spirit and intention of the Constitution for Congress to exercise 'a power to control essentially the pursuits and occupations of individuals in their private concerns—a power to force great and sudden changes both of occupation and property upon individuals, not as incidental to any other power but as a direct and substantive power. If such changes were wrought incidentally only and were the necessary consequence of such imposts as Congress, for the leading purpose of revenue, should enact, then they could not be complained of. But he doubted whether Congress fairly possessed the power of turning the incident into the principal; and instead of leaving manufactures to the incidental protection of such laws as should be passed with a primary regard to revenue, of enacting laws with the avowed object of giving preference to particular manufactures, and with an entire disregard to all considerations of revenue.' (Stanwood, Edward, American Tariff Controversies, New York, 1903, vol. I, pp. 291–348.) The question was the subject of much debate in the political campaigns of 1824 and 1828, the point of unconstitutionality being strenuously supported in Southern States. Secretary F. J. Walker elaborated the argument in his Treasury report of 1845. Later success of the Democratic Party in breaking down the protective system resulted in a long disuse of the constitutional argument. The Civil War restored the advocates of protection to power, and the effect of that great conflict was to establish the ascendancy of a liberal over a strict construction of the Constitution. Not until 1892 was the question raised again, and then the Democratic Party, which asserted in its platform that the Constitution confers no power to lay duties save for the purposes of revenue. With the accession to power of the party the principle was allowed to become quiescent."

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. It has been generally accepted that the United States customs tariff is constitutional as an exercise of the congressional "power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations."

Says Edward Stanwood in his American Tariff Controversies, page 348:

It is extremely unlikely that the constitutionality of a tariff law will ever again be seriously discussed before the people. It is still more unlikely that, should it arise again, any fresh arguments can be adduced either for or against the power of Congress in the premises. Surely if the people of the country could appreciate the enormous inconveniences to the whole system of government which would result from an authoritative pronouncement against the unrestrained power of Congress over external taxation they would rejoice that the question is closed forever and would treat as disturbers of the public peace all who should endeavor to kindle a fire from the ashes of this extinct controversy.

As I said in the beginning, Mr. President, I now repeat, the history of the United States tariff almost covers the history of the United States. If we do not consider the changes growing out of necessities and granting the various powers of meeting those necessities, we should go back tremendously far if we ever tried to live over again the controversies which have been worked out in the past 150 years.

It has been necessary as a historical development for an increasing control of the tariff to be placed in the hands of the President.

This development is well described by John Day Larkin, Ph. D., in his study of the President's Control of the Tariff, published by Harvard University Press, 1936, pages 38–39. Dr. Larkin shows that as early as the Washington administration—

The President was provided with power to suspend certain legislation in force with regard to the regulation of commerce, provided the foreign countries affected by this legislation should refrain from certain-named practices at any time that Congress was not in session (Stat. 372). Similar acts have been in force throughout most of our history. An act of June 3, 1798, gave President Adams power to restore commercial relations with France, which had been suspended by Congress, provided France "shall clearly disavow, and shall be found to refrain from the aggressions, depredation, and hostilities which have been and are by them encouraged and maintained against the vessels and other properties of the citizens of the United States."

In order to make the tariff of the United States more adaptable to realities, the reciprocity program was undertaken in 1890. This program gave to the President considerable Executive control of the tariff. The measures, and the results thereof, are briefly summarized in the recent hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate on the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, pages 733 to 735, revised print. They are, therefore, available to all the Members of the Senate, and I will not repeat them here.

Authority to levy additional duties and even to embargo imports under certain conditions was also given to the President under sections 316 and 317 of the Tariff Act of 1922. Probably in that act the greatest grants to the President were given, and it is probable that from that act we should sustain the most satisfaction to ourselves in attempting to bear out the statements of the evolutionary process and the necessary evolutionary process.

Mr. President, I desire to conclude by a quotation from Daniel Webster. Those who are kind enough to listen will of course realize the thought of the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] which rushed to my mind when I read this quotation. The quotation does more than that. It recognizes the fact that back in Daniel Webster's time—and it is fine to hear his words echo in this Hall, if not his voice—he recognized the fact of changing conditions, and the need of our Government to change its attitudes in order to meet conditions; and as the senior Senator from Arizona always leads us in the pursuance of the practice of accepting the doctrine of inconsistency, it is fine to know that the Senator has in Daniel Webster himself all the authority,

I think, which any Senator need have for taking that stand. But as I read this quotation, may I ask the Senate to think not only of Webster admitting the fact that he is inconsistent, but also to think of the history of the evolution of the technique of the tariff as it has developed in our country, and see that as early as 1846 Daniel Webster saw that that was inevitable.

Sir, with the leave of the Senate I shall proceed to consider the effects of this bill upon some of those interests which have been regarded as protected interests.

I shall not argue at length the question whether the Government has committed itself to maintain interests that have grown up under laws such as have been passed for 30 years back. I will not argue the question whether, looking to the policy indicated by the laws of 1789, 1816, 1824, 1828, 1832, and 1842, there has been ground for the industrious and enterprising people of the United States, engaged in home pursuits, to expect Government protection for internal industry. The question is, Do these laws, or do they not, from 1789 till the present time, constantly show and maintain a purpose, a policy, which might naturally induce men to invest property in manufactures and to commit themselves to those pursuits in life? Without lengthened argument I shall take this for granted.

But, sir, before I proceed further with this part of the case I will take notice of what appears, latterly, to be an attempt, by the republication of opinions and expressions, arguments and speeches of mine at an earlier and later period of life, to found against me a charge of inconsistency on this subject of the protective policy of the country. Mr. President, if it be an inconsistency to hold an opinion upon a subject at one time and in one state of circumstances, and to hold a different opinion upon the same subject at another time and in a different state of circumstances, I admit the charge. Nay, sir, I will go further; and in regard to questions which, from their nature, do not depend upon circumstances for their true and just solution, I mean constitutional questions, if it be an inconsistency to hold an opinion today, even upon such a question, and on that same question to hold a different opinion a quarter of a century afterward upon a more comprehensive view of the whole subject, with a more thorough investigation into the original purposes and objects of that Constitution, and especially after a more thorough exposition of those objects and purposes by those who framed it and have been trusted to administer it, I should not shrink even from that imputation. I hope I know more of the Constitution of my country than I did when I was 20 years old. I hope I have contemplated its great objects more broadly. I hope I have read with deeper interests the sentiments of the great men who framed it. I hope I have studied with more care the condition of the country when the Convention assembled to form it. And yet I do not know that I have much to retract or to change on these points.

But, sir, I am of the opinion of a very eminent person who had occasion not long since to speak of this topic in another place. Inconsistencies of opinion arising from changes of circumstances are often justifiable. But there is one sort of inconsistency which is culpable. It is the inconsistency between a man's conviction and his vote; between his conscience and his conduct. No man shall ever charge me with an inconsistency like that. And now, sir, allow me to say that I am quite indifferent, or rather thankful, to those conductors of the public press who think they cannot do better than now and then to spread my poor opinions before the public.

I have said many times, and it is true, that up to the year 1824 the people of that part of the country to which I belong, being addicted to commerce, having been successful in commerce, their capital being very much engaged in commerce, were averse to entering upon a system of manufacturing operations. Every Member in Congress from the State of Massachusetts, with the exception, I think, of one, voted against the act of 1824. But what were we to do? Were we not bound, after 1816 and 1824, to consider that the policy of the country was settled, had become settled, as a policy, to protect the domestic industry of the country by solemn laws? The leading speech which ushered in the act of 1824 was called a speech for the American System. The bill was carried principally by the Middle States. Pennsylvania and New York would have it so, and what were we to do? Were we to stand aloof from the occupations which others were pursuing around us? Were we to pick clean teeth on a constitutional doubt which a majority in the councils of the Nation had overruled? No, sir; we had no option. All that was left us was to fall in with the settled policy of the country; because, if anything can ever settle the practical construction of the Constitution of the country, it must be these repeated decisions. New England then did fall in. She went into manufacturing operations, not from original choice, but from the necessity of the circumstances in which the legislation of the country had placed her. And, for one, I resolved then, and have acted upon the resolution ever since, that, having compelled the Eastern States to go into these pursuits for a livelihood, the country was bound to fulfill the just expectations which it had inspired.

* * * * * * *

The interest of every laboring community requires diversity of occupations, pursuits, and objects of industry. The more that diversity is multiplied or extended, the better. To diversify employment is to increase employment and to enhance wages. And, sir, take this great truth, place it on the title page of every book of political economy intended for the use of the United States; put it in every farmer's almanac; let it be the heading of the column in every mechanic's magazine, proclaim it everywhere, and make it a proverb, that where there is work for the hands of men, there will be work for their teeth. Where there is employment, there will be bread. It is a great blessing to the poor to have cheap food; but greater than that, prior to that, and of still higher value, is the blessing of being able to buy food by honest and respectable employment. Employment feeds and clothes and instructs. Employment gives health, sobriety, and morals. Constant employment and well-paid labor produce, in a country like ours, general prosperity, content, and cheerfulness. Thus happy have we seen the country. Thus happy may we long continue to see it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HATCH. I was interested in the statement just read by the Senator from Utah, especially with reference to the inconsistency of such a great American as Daniel Webster. Only recently I was reading a debate in the earlier sessions of the House of Representatives, when an eminent Member of that body during the lifetime of Daniel Webster—in fact, when he was Secretary of State—made this observation:

He may have been contrary to himself, but he was never contrary to the Republic.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, in conclusion I merely emphasize what I stated in the beginning—these two great subjects, the constitutional question and the tariff question, must be recognized as subjects of change. They cannot be considered as static. We live in a growing age and with changing conditions constantly facing us.

The technique of the tariff must be in keeping with the requirements of the Constitution, but the requirements of the Constitution will be found to be of an evolutionary nature if we once accept the theory laid down by those who first started to interpret the Constitution as a growing instrument to last throughout the ages.

I am sure that with the quotation of Daniel Webster one must be forced to the conclusion that had he lived on through the years and down to this day he would have come to the same conclusion in defining the Constitution of the United States to which I came in the little definition which I gave in the beginning of my remarks. I think that anyone who could live through the crises of this country would be forced to see the Constitution of the United States as merely the companion of the American people in the accomplishment of their political and social objectives.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate on the question now before it, but I should prefer to proceed the first thing tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Missouri in the chair). Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Tomorrow I shall not be able to be present at the session of the Senate, because I have to fulfill an engagement of some 6 weeks' standing to address the National Life Underwriters' Association of Illinois, and necessarily I will not be in the Chamber when the vote comes on the pending amendment, or on any other amendment which may be voted on tomorrow.

I have arranged a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and my vote will thus be protected in line with the committee's position on all matters that come before the Senate tomorrow, or Saturday, if there should be a session Saturday.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. After consulting with Senators on both sides of the pending proposition, I think we have been able to work out an agreement, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock p. m. tomorrow definitely, the Senate proceed without further debate to vote on the pending amendment, and any amendments to or substitutes therefor.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I shall have to object.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not want to speak this afternoon, and I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Idaho with the understanding that I am to have the floor at the conclusion of his remarks. I do not ask unanimous consent for that purpose, but I yield to the Senator from Idaho for the present with that understanding.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, the Trade Agreements Act is simply a streamlined program of the New Deal for the purpose of reducing tariffs on the products of industry, mines, and agriculture. This measure has been a law for nearly 6 years, and yet none of the problems of agriculture or industry have been solved.

Mr. President, I shall confine my discussion of this subject almost entirely to the injury which this program has done to agriculture. There can be no permanent solution of the farm problem until the American farmer has the American market for the crops and livestock which he produces. A prosperous agriculture is necessary for a prosperous country.

Subsidies, bonuses, and quotas cannot be effective unless the farmer has the American market. Purchases of surplus commodities by the Government while tariff walls are being lowered so that farm products can be imported from abroad simply does not make sense.

Our Government owes the primary industries of this Nation that measure of protection which is necessary to maintain the American standard of living and to give to our citizens those industrial and earning opportunities which are the birthright of free Americans.

Extension of the trade-agreement program will lower the tariff on every product of the farm, thereby forcing our people to compete in production with the peon labor of foreign countries. Certainly our people did not send us here to foster such injustice.

Under the Trade Agreements Act the Congress delegated its tariff-making authority to the President, giving him the power to raise or lower tariffs as much as 50 percent. This power was given the President in 1934, just 2 years after he had assured the farmers in the 1932 campaign:

> I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived.

American farmers accepted this statement as a promise that tariffs on farm products would not be lowered. In my opinion, that promise, more than anything else, won the confidence and support of the farmers for Mr. Roosevelt. And what happened? The American farmer is being sacrificed to the disastrous doctrines of free trade.

There is no objection to the principle of reciprocity. Senator Borah stated the matter very clearly during the debate on the Senate floor in 1937:

> To the extent we can build up a trade based upon the principle of exchanging the products which one nation has and another has not, we are building upon a sound principle of international trade.

But Senator Borah was unwilling to surrender to the State Department the authority, placed by the Constitution solely in Congress, to write the tariff laws of the United States, even when reciprocity was the announced aim. During the debate in 1934, before we had had an opportunity to see the law in operation, he said:

> I have no doubt that he (the Secretary of State) would execute these treaties in accordance with his convictions. He is a man of convictions. When he does so he may leave the cattle grower, the wool grower, the bean grower of my State utterly unprotected. He may not, but he may. If he does, where is the Senator from Idaho? Powerless. He will have surrendered all power to protect the people who elected him to the position he now holds.

A brief glance at the record is sufficient to show that Senator Borah's fears have been realized. Operation of the reciprocal trade treaty program has left the industries of the West unprotected. The program has been one of lower tariffs, not reciprocity.

We are told that no agreements would have been made if they had been subjected to the logrolling and pressure groups of Congress. The truth is that agreements have been made for which no Senator or Representative responsible to the people of my State would have voted.

Secretary Hull, as a member of the House Ways and Means Committee in 1930, was violently opposed to Congress delegating its tariff-making powers. Concerning the flexible provisions of the 1930 act, which are mild compared to the present broad transfer of power, he said:

> The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the flexible tariff clause is astonishing. It is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of a government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As was said on a former occasion, "This is too much power for a bad man to have, or for a good man to want."

The Secretary's statements even today are at wide variance with the operation of the trade-agreements program. He has assured the farmers that the primary purpose is to restore foreign markets to American agriculture. In that purpose the program has failed, and failed miserably.

The National Grange, largest and oldest national farm organization in the United States, at its recent meeting at Peoria, Ill., adopted a resolution stating unequivocally:

> The reciprocal trade agreements program has caused serious damage to American agriculture. It has depressed farm prices by encouraging imports of competitive products from countries where substandard labor conditions prevail. It is wrong in principle and violates the Constitution. It should not be renewed when it expires by its own limitations on June 12, 1940.

Can there be any more damning indictment of the trade-agreements program? In the face of this statement, how can any man who claims to be in sympathy with the farmers favor extension of the power in the State Department?

Let us see how the program has worked. During the fiscal year 1939 exports of American farm products were $104,000,000 less than during the fiscal year 1934, before the program went into operation. But that is not all. Imports of competitive farm products—products which the American farmer can and does produce—were $68,000,000 more during the fiscal year 1939 than during 1934.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, before the trade agreements were in effect, 39.2 percent of our exports were agricultural products. During the fiscal year 1939 only 23.7 percent of our exports were agricultural products. Does that indicate that any foreign markets were restored to American agriculture? The Secretary of Agriculture recently told a Senate committee:

Because of the world situation we cannot now hope to expand markets by increasing agricultural exports.

Yet we continue reducing our tariffs in the hope of benefits which we cannot expect to receive.

It is abundantly clear that the program could not have been designed to help the farmer. When agreements are made with such countries as Canada and other nations which have large agricultural surpluses, as we have, they must necessarily be made at the expense of the American farmer. Any concessions we make to these nations must involve reductions in farm tariffs.

I should like to read a brief paragraph from the London Economist of March 9, 1933. It sets forth in words clearer than the State Department has yet been willing to use the policy that has been followed in both the trade agreements which were subsequently made with Canada.

The Canadian Government has sent a memorandum to Washington embodying its suggestions as a basis for the projected reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States. It is understood that this document suggests concessions in the American tariff for the benefit of Canadian products of the farm, forest, and sea (particularly livestock, milk, cream, and fish), and offers in return concessions in the Canadian tariff on iron and steel products, and a fairly long list of other commodities which make a substantial list.

This statement, written when the first agreement with Canada was being negotiated, is an accurate summary of the policy followed in both Canadian agreements. It is, in substance, the policy which must be followed in every agreement with a predominantly agricultural nation.

This policy is inconsistent with every effort being made to help the American farmer. As L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange, expressed it, in testifying before the Senate Finance Committee:

We have the spectacle of the Government, under the guise of soil conservation, paying the farmers of the country approximately $500,000,000 a year to reduce acreage and production, while permitting and even encouraging competitive imports of farm products valued at the same amount.

One of the objectives of the farm program has been to establish parity prices—that is to give the farmer's dollar the same purchasing power it had from 1909 to 1914. Appropriations have been made to achieve that purpose. Yet the second Canadian agreement, which carried even further than the first the policy of reducing farm tariffs, cut the tariff on hogs, chickens, eggs, barley, buckwheat, oats, rye, hay, potatoes, and apples. At the time the agreement went into effect, January 1, 1939, all these commodities were selling at only a fraction—in some cases as little as 38 percent—of the parity price.

The tariff on cattle was reduced in the first Canadian agreement in 1936, and in the 1939 agreement even more sweeping reductions were made. Following the second agreement, $19,692,054 worth of cattle were imported into the United States during the first 11 months of 1939. This is an increase of 138 percent over the value of the cattle imports for the first 11 months of 1938.

The tariff on alfalfa seed was reduced 50 percent in the first Canadian agreement, and in the second agreement it was bound at the new low rate. The tariff on clover seed was reduced in the first agreement, and further reduced in the second agreement. The resulting increases in imports have been startling.

During the fiscal year 1935, we imported 124,000 pounds of alfalfa seed. During the first 11 months of 1939 alone, we imported over 2,400,000 pounds.

During the fiscal year 1935 we imported 1,430,000 pounds of clover seed. During the first 11 months of 1939 we imported 12,700,000 pounds.

The tariff on seed potatoes was reduced in the first Canadian agreement and was further reduced in the second agreement. In the second agreement the tariff on potatoes other than seed potatoes was also reduced, in some categories as much as 50 percent; and at that time the farmers of the great potato-producing States, of which Idaho is one, had potatoes rotting in their cellars.

The first Canadian agreement reduced the tariff on apples from 25 cents to 15 cents per bushel, and in the second agreement the tariff was bound at the reduced rate.

The second agreement made a reduction in the tariff on eggs from 10 to 5 cents per dozen, the maximum reduction allowed by law.

The second agreement also provided for reduction in the tariff on hogs, bacon, and pork. This agreement also reduced the tariff on milk 50 percent; and the tariff on cream, which had already been reduced in the first agreement, was reduced the full 50 percent.

The tariff on Cheddar cheese, which had been reduced from 7 to 5 cents per pound in the earlier agreement, was reduced to 4 cents in the second agreement.

The farmer was not the only one directly injured by the Canadian agreements. The tariff on zinc was reduced January 1, 1939, in the second Canadian agreement, with the result that zinc imports reached almost $3,000,000 during the first 11 months of 1939 compared with $825,000 during the first 11 months of 1938.

The immediate effect of reducing the zinc tariff has been to close mines and to throw miners and smeltermen out of work. Even more serious is the lasting damage that is being done to the zinc industry. A paragraph from the article by E. W. Pehrson in the 1939 Mineral Yearbook, published by the Bureau of Mines, is well worth reading:

If the domestic industry is to continue to supply the national requirements it will have to become adjusted to the lower price level, which is further reduced by a cut of .035 cents per pound in its tariff protection. To accomplish this, costs of production will have to be reduced, chiefly by lowering wages and by selective mining of the higher-grade portions of ore deposits, neither of which is desirable. Reduction of wages is contrary to present governmental policies of increasing purchasing power, and the robbing of ore bodies is decidedly anticonservational and detrimental to the long-time welfare of the industry.

This list could be extended much further; but these examples are sufficient to show that the farmer and the miner of the West are paying far more than their share of what it is costing this country to be a "good neighbor." The farmer certainly can ill afford to pay for the good will that may be acquired when the State Department generously gives his market to foreign countries. Not all the subsidies that can be given him from the Federal Treasury can compensate the farmer for the loss of the American market.

During the fiscal years 1938 and 1939 the Surplus Commodities Corporation spent over $30,000,000 in purchases of 20 different farm products in an effort to raise prices by removing surpluses. During the same period, $92,298,000 worth of the same commodities were imported from abroad.

We have already seen that the tariff on eggs was reduced 50 percent in the Canadian agreement. This reduction was made in spite of the fact that up to June 30, 1939, over 30,000,000 dozen eggs had been purchased by the Surplus Commodities Corporation in an effort to remove the surplus.

Surplus apples have been purchased in an amount of over 9,000,000 bushels. This did not prevent the State Department from reducing the tariff on apples.

The Surplus Commodities Corporation has spent over $4,000,000 for the purchase of milk surpluses during the fiscal years 1938 and 1939; yet the tariff on milk was reduced 50 percent in the second Canadian agreement.

In 1930, the duty on Cuban sugar was fixed at $2 per hundred pounds. Under the flexible provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Act, the President reduced the tariff to $1.50 per hundred pounds; and after the Trade Agreements Act it was further reduced to 90 cents. A quota has been adopted under which Cuba is given 28.6 percent of the American sugar market, and American sugar-beet growers have been given a Government subsidy. At present, a desperate fight is being made to retain the benefits that have been given the American producers, as the concessions that have been made, without the benefits, would mean the destruction of the beet-sugar industry in the United States.

The reduction in the tariff on Cuban sugar has injured American producers and taxpayers without benefiting the consumer. Mr. L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange, testified before the Senate Finance Committee:

Since 1934 we have reduced the duty on imports of sugar from Cuba from 2 to 0.9 cents per pound. Between September 3, 1934, and December 31, 1939, the Treasury sustained a loss of revenue in this connection amounting to $133,924,000. In the meantime, the retail price of sugar to the consumer has not been reduced to the extent of a single mill. The chief beneficiaries have been some of the biggest banks of Wall Street, which own the major portion of the Cuban sugar industry.

If the authority to make trade agreements is extended another 3 years, an even more serious blow will be dealt to agriculture. In the negotiations with Argentina, the State Department demonstrated its willingness to reduce tariffs on a large number of commodities for which the American farmer already needs a larger market. Congress has granted to the State Department authority to barter away the protection which Congress has given to the vital industries and agricultural products of the West.

In 1931 there were 316 casein factories in the United States. Since then the industry has been protected by a tariff of 5½ cents per pound, which was established in 1930, and by 1939 there were 664 factories in 24 different States. This is an industry which utilizes skim milk, of which we have millions of gallons each year which cannot be profitably marketed. It is an industry which certainly is capable of supplying our domestic needs. Since September 1939, 17,000,000 pounds of casein have been imported from Argentina, which is more than the entire Pacific coast production; yet casein was considered for tariff reduction in the Argentine negotiations.

Tariff reductions on corn were also considered in these negotiations. This is a crop of which the United States produces 60 percent of the world's supply, and after three successive bumper crops we have millions of bushels under Government loan. Farmers have been paid to reduce their acreage. Yet if it were not for the tariff, Argentina could successfully compete in the American market, because the water rate for transportation from Buenos Aires is less than the railroads in this country can offer to seaboard markets.

Reduction in the tariff on turkeys was also considered in spite of the fact that American turkey production in 1939 reached a new record, and turkeys have recently sold in the American market at less than half the cost of production.

Wool, in grades which are in competition with probably about 20 percent of the American production, was also considered for tariff reductions. This was done in spite of the fact that tariff rates on shoddy and wool rags which supplant virgin wool in the American market had been sharply reduced in the British trade agreement, with the result that imports increased 785 percent during 1939 over 1938. In this agreement the rates on woolen fabrics had been reduced as well. Imports of woolen fabrics during the first 5 months of 1939, following the reduction of the tariff, increased 385 percent over a similar period in 1938. It has been estimated that in 1939, since the British agreement, our wool imports in manufactured form displaced 21,000,000 pounds of American-grown wool in the market.

Tariff reductions on flax were also considered in the Argentine negotiations, although foreign countries can produce flax more cheaply than it can be produced in the United States.

Imports of canned beef from Argentina average between eighty and ninety million pounds annually. During the first 11 months of 1939 we imported more than 82,000,000 pounds, all of which displaced American-grown beef in the market. This is because the tariff on canned beef is too low; yet in the Argentine agreement the Secretary of State demonstrated his willingness to reduce it. Hides, of which we have imported from 1,300,000 to 3,000,000 annually in recent years, were also listed among the articles on which reductions were to be considered.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take up more of the Senate's time in considering in detail the various items on which reductions in the Argentine negotiations were proposed, but nearly all of the tariff reductions were on products of the farm. I ask unanimous consent to have included in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, the list of items issued by the State Department which were the subjects for negotiation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LIST OF PRODUCTS ON WHICH THE UNITED STATES WILL CONSIDER GRANTING CONCESSIONS TO ARGENTINA

NOTE.—The rates of duty indicated are those now applicable to products of Argentina. Where the rate is one which has been reduced pursuant to a previous trade agreement by 50 percent (the maximum permitted by the Trade Agreements Act) it is indicated by the symbol MR. Where the rate represents a reduction pursuant to a previous trade agreement, but less than a 50-percent reduction, it is indicated by the symbol R. Where a rate has been bound against increase, but has not been reduced in a previous trade agreement it is indicated by the symbol B; likewise, items which have been bound free of duty are indicated by the symbol B.

For the purpose of facilitating identification of the articles listed, reference is made in the list to the paragraph numbers of the tariff schedules in the Tariff Act of 1930, or, as the case may be, to the appropriate sections of the Internal Revenue Code. The descriptive phraseology is, however, in many cases limited to a narrower field than that covered by the numbered tariff paragraph or section in the Internal Revenue Code. In such cases only the articles covered by the descriptive phraseology of the list will come under consideration for the granting of concessions.

In the event that articles which are at present regarded as classifiable under the descriptions included in the above list are excluded therefrom by judicial decision or otherwise prior to the conclusion of the agreement, the list will nevertheless be considered as including such articles.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, at present negotiations with Argentina have been stopped; but I do not believe there is a particle of doubt in anyone's mind as to why they were stopped. It was not because the State Department suddenly discovered that we have a corn surplus or that the cattle industry is already being injured by imports of canned beef. It does not take lengthy hearings to develop these facts.

Moreover, the agreements that have been made previously, over the strongest protests farmers and producers were capable of making, indicate that perhaps the Department is not particularly concerned by the extent to which American markets are injured by trade agreements. The negotiations were called off because the State Department is asking the Congress this year to renew its authority to write tariff laws. Officials of the State Department have condemned Congress for logrolling. Apparently their desire is to roll their own logs; and they are now doing it on a grander scale than Congress ever attempted.

More important than the reason for calling off negotiations on the treaty with Argentina, as far as the people I represent are concerned, is the fact that there is no assurance that the negotiations will not be reopened after the law has been reenacted. When Secretary Hull was asked in the course of the House hearings, "Is it your idea that conditions may so change that negotiations may be resumed a little later?" he replied, "This general statement said that these negotiations were terminated."

The statement referred to is a joint statement by the Governments of the United States and Argentina, released by the State Department. It is not at all reassuring when we compare it with the statement of the President of Argentina, who is reported by an Associated Press dispatch to have said that he feels that President Roosevelt would favor resumption of the negotiations in the near future, and he is quoted as saying, "For my part, I fully desire it."

In the light of what tariff reductions have already cost the people of the West, I feel safe in saying that our people do not share the attitude of the President of Argentina. The Argentine proposal was a threat to their prosperity, which only the expiration of the Trade Agreements Act can remove.

The Chilean agreement is still pending. An inquiry at the State Department as to its status reveals that it is "temporarily quiescent"—if you know what that means. In this agreement we find that it is the farmer again who will bear the burden.

A reduction in the tariff on beans is being considered, notwithstanding the fact that the United States has the largest surplus of beans on record, amounting to approximately 3,500,000 bags. Large purchases by the Surplus Commodities Corporation have not been sufficient to assure the bean grower the cost of production. Idaho produces one-third of the Nation's bean crop, and the producer there is compelled to pay very high freight rates to reach the principal markets of the East. It is impossible for him to compete with the cheaply produced beans from South America and Japan, which can be transported by water to the great cities of the East, except for the protection the tariff gives him. Any reduction of the tariff on beans simply means destruction of that industry in the West.

In addition to the tariff on beans, tariff reductions are being considered on apricots, grapes, peaches, plums, pears, melons, lentils, and other farm products. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the list of these products, prepared by the State Department, inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIST OF PRODUCTS ON WHICH THE UNITED STATES WILL CONSIDER GRANTING CONCESSIONS TO CHILE

NOTE.—The rates of duty or tax indicated are those now applicable to products of Chile.

For the purpose of facilitating identification of the articles listed, reference is made in the list to the paragraph numbers of the tariff schedules in the Tariff Act of 1930, and to the appropriate section of the Internal Revenue Code. The descriptive phraseology is, however, in some cases limited to a narrower field than that covered by the numbered tariff paragraph. In such cases only the articles covered by the descriptive phraseology of the list will come under consideration for the granting of concessions.

In the event that articles which are at present regarded as classifiable under the descriptions included in the list are excluded therefrom by judicial decision or otherwise prior to the conclusion of the agreement, the list will nevertheless be considered as including such articles.

	All articles dutiable under the Tariff Act of 1930, not provided for heretofore in this item, in which copper (including copper in alloys) is the component material of chief value.	3 cents per pound.
3425	All articles dutiable under the Tariff Act of 1930, not provided for heretofore in this item, containing 4 percent or more of copper by weight.	3 percent ad valorem or ¾ cent per pound whichever is the lower.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, copper is one of the items on this list. Copper was originally considered for a reduction in the import tax which was established by act of Congress in 1932, and renewed by Congress the last time on June 29 of last year. Congress renewed this tax because the United States has large copper surpluses at the present time, and the ability to supply adequately the domestic market. Moreover, foreign producers can supply copper at least 4 cents per pound cheaper than it can be obtained from American mines. A reduction in this tax would close mines, throw men out of work, and do irreparable damage to an industry that is of vital importance to the prosperity of the West.

It has been the custom of the State Department to give out no information as to the changes contemplated until the final publication of the agreement. In this instance, however, they have seen fit to make the announcement, "in view of the widespread interest in this question," that no changes in the tariff rate would be made.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this announcement by the State Department included in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 21, 1939.

The public notice of intention to negotiate a trade agreement with the Government of Chile, issued by the Department of State on October 2, 1939, was accompanied by a list of products on which the United States would consider granting concessions to that country. Among the articles listed were copper and copper products, the present tariff and tax treatment of which were indicated in the list.

Hearings upon the negotiations with Chile were completed on November 28, and voluminous data have been submitted to the trade-agreements organization from industry and labor in the United States with respect to the position of copper in international trade and the effect which a concession to Chile in the import tax on that product might have upon domestic production. Following the study of these data and additional material available to the Government from other sources, and after consultation with the Chilean Government, a decision has been reached to make no concession on copper or copper products in the agreement with Chile, when and if concluded. In view of the widespread interest in the question, it has been decided to make this decision known publicly at this time.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, it is difficult for many of us not to wonder if this announcement was not made for its effect upon votes of Members of Congress from the copper-producing States. If so, it would be well for them to reflect that their constituents will not receive the same thoughtful consideration from the State Department after this act has been extended.

I have considered primarily the effect of the trade agreements upon agriculture, because the Secretary of State has again and again, in his official statements, indicated his solicitude for the farmer. Most of what I have said, however, could apply as well to labor. It is as foolish to attempt to raise wages at a time when we are importing goods made with substandard wages as it is to attempt to raise farm prices while we are importing agricultural commodities. Labor suffers from foreign imports. As Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, has expressed it:

> We do not think that it is good economics * * * to transfer to foreign countries the opportunities of employment which would be ours if we produced those imported products which we are in a position to produce.

Mr. President, I have tried as briefly as possible to present some of the effects of the trade agreements on the people of the State I have the honor to represent. Every industry and every citizen of the West has felt the injury of this program.

In return for a concession obtained from only one country, under our unconditional, most-favored-nation policy, we lower tariffs to every country in the world except Germany. We open up our markets to other countries, and receive nothing in return.

In the agreement with the United Kingdom, we lowered numerous tariff rates, in return for which we supposedly received certain concessions. Among these were reduced rates by England on apples and tobacco, but today we find that importation of apples and tobacco has been forbidden by England. Yet the benefits we gave England to the injury of our own producers still stand.

Under the reciprocal-treaty program more than 1,000 tariff rates have been reduced. Of these reductions, 166 have been made in rates on farm commodities. It is apparent that it is the intention of the State Department to lower the tariffs on all farm crops, livestock, and products of the mines and forests. The program has just begun, and unless we halt it it will eventually accomplish the economic ruin of our great primary industries, which are the basic foundation of all our prosperity.

In his Budget message the President called for a reduction in payments to the farmers, and no provision was made in the Budget for parity payments. The administration has gone a long way since the President gave his assurance that farm prices would be raised. His words, I believe, were these:

> If we cannot do it one way, we will do it another. Do it we will.

And now he calls for a reduction in farm payments when the Nation's agriculture is virtually bankrupt.

I have voted for parity payments. I expect to vote for every measure that will help restore to the farmer his share of the national income. Until farm prices reach parity, there can be no lasting prosperity in our country.

This administration has committed our Nation to a low-tariff policy. Even if the treaty power is not extended, agreements already effected have greatly reduced our protection. In view of these circumstances, it would be ruinous to withdraw Government support from the farmer at this time.

I should like to call attention to another phase of this situation. The war in Europe has kept us from feeling the full effects of the tariff reductions. But when the war is over—and all of us hope that will be soon—some 25,000,000 men will be released to an industry already geared to high production. There will be a chaos of unemployment and inflation. Foreign standards of living will be reduced to starvation level. There will be a mad scramble for the markets of the world. It will be a repetition of 20 years ago, when American markets were flooded by goods from across the Atlantic. Do we want American labor and American industries to be in a defenseless position when that time comes?

If the reciprocal trade agreement program is in operation when peace comes, then the hands of Congress, which the Constitution says shall write the laws and ratify treaties, will be tied. Then the people of the United States will pay the full price for Congress having abdicated its constitutional duties.

American agriculture, American labor, and American industries have suffered enough from the effects of the reciprocal trade agreements. I shall cast my vote to take this power away from the executive department and return it to Congress, where it rightfully belongs.

During the delivery of the speech of Mr. THOMAS of Idaho,

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I again renew my request, made a few moments ago, that at the hour of 4 o'clock p. m. tomorrow the Senate proceed to vote on the pending amendment, and amendments thereto, and substitutes therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). The Senator from Kentucky submits a request for unanimous consent, that at the hour of 4 o'clock tomorrow the Senate proceed without further debate to vote upon the pending amendment and any amendments thereto, or any substitute therefor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I hope the agreement may be entered into.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] are absent. They have both expressed a desire to be paired in favor of the amendment. I understand it has been arranged that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is to be paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] is to be paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. Is that correct?

Mr. McNARY. That is correct, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA

After the conclusion of the speech of Mr. THOMAS of Idaho,

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a short time ago before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations holding hearings on the Treasury appropriation bill, the Commissioner of Customs developed facts bearing on the increase of American exports to Soviet Russia. Those facts were developed just at the time when American sympathy for Finland was at white heat, and a few days later I referred to the disclosure on the floor of the Senate.

Later, in order to attract attention to the subject of American relations with Russia, and as a gesture of protest, I moved to strike from the State Department appropriation bill the provision for the salary of the American Ambassador to Russia.

In order to have the RECORD clear and complete, I desire at this time to read into the RECORD certain figures, some of which have been made available to me only this afternoon over the telephone, and have never been heretofore published. The figures bear on the increase of American exports to Soviet Russia.

The first table I shall read covers the months from June to December 1939, and shows the following dollar figures, covering the value of exports, including reexports, from the United States to Soviet Russia: June, $262,000; July, $3,201,000; August, $3,712,000; September—a drop—$1,785,000; October, $8,626,000.

Notice how exports to Russia increase with the war—November, $7,282,000; December, $11,922,000.

I should like to point out that the bulk of this trade is in the following commodities: Gasoline, refined copper in ingot, bars, and so forth; brass plates and sheets; metal-working machinery; refined copper and manufactures; and tin in bars, blocks, and so forth. Tin, as is known, Mr. President, is a critical material.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is cotton in that category?

Mr. LODGE. No; there is no cotton in that category. This seems to be entirely a list of articles which are useful for the purposes of war. Whether these American goods were used to attack the poor Finns, or whether they have been transferred to Germany for her use, I, of course, cannot say.

I should now like to read some concluding figures, comparing the first 2 months of 1940 with the first 2 months of 1939, and I think they will impress and shock the Senate.

The value of exports increased from $2,820,000 in January 1939 to $13,066,348 in January 1940.

For February 1939, as compared to February 1940—and these facts have never before been made public—the value of exports is as follows: February 1939, $2,993,000; February 1940, $7,320,033.

I will read the February figures over again. February 1939, $2,993,000. February 1940, $7,320,033.

In view of the actions that have been taken here, in view of all the protestations we have heard here from those in control, I simply present these figures and ask: What is the foreign policy of this administration?

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield for that purpose?

Mr. ADAMS. My interest was that I might be recognized upon the reconvening of the Senate tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD will show that the Senator from Colorado had the floor at the time of the taking of the recess or adjournment today.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, March 29, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 28, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We give Thee thanks and praise, our Father and our God, for our blessed Redeemer through whom Thy mercy and love have been made known to us. Grant us, we pray Thee, a ready response to every noble thought, incite us with fair play and with a deep desire to know and do Thy holy will. Inspire us to adorn the teaching of the Master, may it lead us in a grandly cooperative service, giving expression to deeds of unselfishness, wise and just for all men. We rejoice that this is our Father's world with its life deep and boundless; unaffrighted by the stars above and undismayed by the graves below. Out of the deep we came and into the deep we go, soothed and saved, deathlessly nourished by the one great Shepherd. His rod and staff will comfort us as we pass through the enshadowed valley leading to the lustrous portals of our eternal home. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I may say that I regret very much the fact that I have to object, because in 13 years' service I have never objected to a request of this sort. However, the gentleman knows that if one or two Members ask for a minute, others will desire the same privilege, and we are very anxious to continue the pending bill. Would not the gentleman reserve his request until after this bill has been disposed of?

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Yes. If the gentleman is going to object, I certainly will. [Laughter.]

Mr. TARVER. The trouble is the gentleman's remarks usually incite someone else to address the House also, and it may lead to a great deal of discussion.

Mr. FISH. This is a very important matter.

Mr. TARVER. I could not afford to accord a privilege that I have just been compelled to refuse another Member.

Mr. FISH. I do not know what I can do to convince the gentleman.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman temporarily withdraw his request?

Mr. FISH. Very temporarily; yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York temporarily withdraws the request.

LABOR-SECURITY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9007) making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9007, with Mr. BUCK in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when the Committee rose last evening there was pending the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The question is on the substitute amendment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Assuming the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], cutting down the appropriation to $39,000,000, is adopted, that will eliminate the recommendation of the subcommittee and also the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON]. Is that true?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state it is entirely up to the committee to vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], as amended, afterward.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. If the substitute is adopted, then will we vote on the Collins amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. After that the committee will vote on the Collins amendment as amended by the substitute.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And assuming that is defeated, we will then vote on the Collins amendment as amended by the Johnson amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. NICHOLS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the substitute amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER as a substitute for the Collins amendment: On page 41, line 4, after the comma, strike out "$79,635,000" and insert "$39,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will report the amendment as amended.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS as amended by the amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma: Strike out the figures "$79,635,000" and insert "$97,085,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that he was in doubt.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. HARE and Mr. COLLINS to act as tellers.

The Committee divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 162 and noes 144.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 6. No non-Federal project costing in excess of $5,000 shall be undertaken or prosecuted under paragraph 1 unless and until the cosponsor has made a written agreement to finance such part of the entire cost thereof as the Federal Security Administrator determines, under the circumstances, is an adequate contribution taking into consideration the financial ability of the cosponsor. The National Youth Administrator, subject to the approval of the Federal Security Administrator, shall prescribe rules and regulations relating to the valuation of contributions in kind by cosponsors of projects through furnishing the use of their own facilities and equipment and the services of their own employees, which shall also allow credit only to the extent that the furnishing of such contributions represents a financial burden which is undertaken by the cosponsors on account of National Youth Administration projects.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 44, line 2, after the word "Federal", insert "construction."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a correction of an inadvertent error made in the drafting of the bill. The Committee intended that the restrictive language contained in this paragraph should apply only to construction projects, and the amendment is offered with a view to correcting the error.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have only a few brief words to offer.

It is not so much the amount of money you have just voted in excess of the Committee's recommendation that disturbs me as it is the damage you have done to the confidence of the Nation in showing this new trend of spending. Of course, you must fully understand that you are flirting with national bankruptcy. Do not doubt it. Those who now furnish you with the borrowed money to run this Government are beginning to understand it, and some of us know they are getting very nervous indeed.

I sympathize with today's Democratic leaders—there seems to be about 20 Democrats trying to conduct the party along proper lines of economy. Your leaders have proved to the Nation that you can no longer control. I call the attention of the Nation to the fact that the Republicans have constantly and continuously stood for economy in expenditures. We lost only a very few votes just a few moments ago from this side of the aisle. I was sorry indeed to see that small loss, because we Republicans have stood for economy so solidly. I am sorry for these Democratic leaders who got their followers into the habit of squandering money.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. No. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but "No" at the present time.

A few years ago when you started on this downward road, when your leaders, oh, so enthusiastically, threateningly, demanded that you vote $4,800,000,000 in blank checks, then another $3,500,000,000 in blank checks you got firmly fixed in your heads the philosophy of this spending spree—this political paradise where you found you could borrow money and not have to raise taxes. I close with the thought I had in my mind in taking the floor, which is that the Chairman of this Committee, the gentleman from Georgia, has my deep sympathy. He has awakened too late. His forces have so long gone on spending sprees they cannot stop.

The Republicans believe in N. Y. A. as much as you. How you rejoiced when you voted this extra money. I rejoice that those boys will get it, but I do not rejoice in the feeling that is going over this Nation today as the people realize the trend of the spending spree. It is going to do havoc with the confidence of those whose confidence you have been trying lately to restore.

Leaders of the Democratic Party, I sympathize with you deeply. You are reaping the rewards of your previous willingness to throw away money. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; if I have the time.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman from Massachusetts says the Republicans believe in N. Y. A. as much as we do. How do you account for the fact that the Republicans do not vote the way they believe?

Mr. GIFFORD. Just because we will not vote for any skyrocketed amount does not mean we do not believe in the principle of it. The N. Y. A. is good. Your C. C. C. camp program at $1,200 per head is wrong. You should not spend more than $300 on each individual case. We have not enough funds to exceed that and do justice to all. I would like to have time to portray the picture with regard to the C. C. C. camps. You politically minded gentlemen stood here yesterday and rejoiced so greatly in spending $1,200 per head to maintain camps, half of them, in winter, not functioning. I have not the time to portray that as I would like to. But go ahead and vote away this money. Rather you are voting away the confidence of the Nation.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the last speaker made the statement that you cannot spend over $300 on any boy. I want to remind the gentleman that he is spending many, many hundreds of dollars on American jailbirds. [Applause.] He is spending three thousand some hundred dollars just to secure them individually in institutions, and this figure does not include the cost of their maintenance.

Let me remind you that there are many fathers and mothers in this country who do not mind being broke when they look over the family table and see their children about them. They went broke to provide for the children they love. There is a great party in this country today that is interested in the whole of America and in the youth of America, and that party today is the Democratic Party. They will to carry on. [Applause.] We might just as well face the facts. Some have been feeding the public language long enough, but there are others here determined to give them service, and we are giving service today when we take care of the youth of this Nation as we did this morning. It is economy, I tell you. If only 10 percent of those we are looking after were protected from the pitfalls which ensnare youth, we would be more than recompensed for the money which we have spent or authorized to be spent this morning.

I am happy to have this opportunity to say in contradiction to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that any boy in this country is worth more than $300.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I shall be happy to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. While the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] is sincere in his position—and he has steadfastly taken that position—I call to the attention of my friend the fact that one of the slogans of the Republican Party last fall in the campaign in Massachusetts was to help youth, yet today we see the spectacle of only one Republican Member from Massachusetts voting for the amendment which was just adopted.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. In the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi he recited how certain Republicans——

Mr. RABAUT. What gentleman?

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] made a speech yesterday about certain Republicans. We have one splendid, honest, upright Democrat from Massachusetts, a splendid specimen, Mr. McCORMACK. [Applause.] But how many Democrats have we from Boston in jail or about to go there, and in New York and New Orleans, and all over this Nation? I want to bring that in because I did not have the time yesterday to answer the gentleman from Mississippi. There are dozens of Democrats in jail to one Republican.

Mr. RABAUT. Variety of opinion makes a horse race. If the gentleman had sat on a committee as I have, a committee that appropriates for the housing and care of the inmates of the Federal prisons of the Nation, he would realize how many there are all over the country.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. So that the remark of my friend from Massachusetts will not be misunderstood—and I know he does not want it misunderstood—I may say that my district is a very wholesome American district, and, as the gentleman knows, we have very few from my district confined in jail.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has apparently overlooked the economic factor in connection with the problem of youth delinquency.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I did not understand the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] about the jailbirds, but he was probably referring to those members of the Republican Cabinet to whom I referred yesterday who went to jail 10 or 15 years ago.

May I repeat that we are not going to get out of this depression by borrowing from the rich and giving to the poor for the all of us to pay back with interest. Until we depreciate our currency and bring about sufficient expansion to raise commodity prices back to their proper level—until we do that we are not going to restore prosperity in this country and we are not going to be able to stop spending.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to make the point of order that the gentleman is not addressing his remarks to the pending amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Has the gentleman read the amendment? What is the amendment?

Mr. TARVER. The amendment is to strike out the last word.

Mr. RANKIN. What is the last word? I am having the last word. The chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations ought to inform himself what the amendment is.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman should address his remarks to the pending amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I submit this must not be taken out of my time. If the gentleman is going to raise a point of order, let him point out wherein I am not discussing the amendment. He has not even referred to the bill and does not seem to know what the last word is.

Mr. TARVER. I wonder if the gentleman knows what the last word is?

Mr. RANKIN. I am trying to explain to the gentleman what the last word is.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman is discussing something with which he is not familiar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] will be obliged to confine his remarks to the amendment now pending before the committee, which is a committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER]. The Chair is therefore constrained, however regretfully, to sustain the point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to discuss this amendment. What are they trying to do by this amendment? They are trying to restore prosperity, and, as I have pointed out, you never can restore prosperity by borrowing from the rich and giving to the poor and having the rest of us pay it back with compound interest.

The trouble with the Republican Party on this issue is that they have no program. They have no more program than is manifested in this amendment.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is proceeding in contravention to the ruling of the Chair. The gentleman's remarks have no relation whatever to the committee amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the reading of the committee amendment and that it be not taken out of my time, to show the gentleman from Georgia that he is wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee amendment will be again reported by the Clerk.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I object. If the gentleman does not know what the committee amendment is, he is not in position to discuss it.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman from Georgia does not know, bring in some other members of the Appropriations Committee and maybe they can tell him.

Mr. TARVER. It is the gentleman from Mississippi who does not know.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] taking up my time. I fear he is violating the rules of the House.

But Mr. Chairman, having had the last word, and having answered all the arguments of the opposition, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Georgia. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 10. No alien shall be given employment or continued in employment on any work project prosecuted under the appropriation in paragraph 1 and no part of the money appropriated in paragraph 1 shall be available to pay any person who has not made or who does not make affidavit as to United States citizenship, such affidavit to be considered prima facie evidence of such citizenship.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, this provision in paragraph 10 is an inhibition against the employment of aliens which has been carried in the bill heretofore and is simply being carried forward in the language of the pending bill. However, when the bill was originally submitted to the committee all the appropriation was set up in paragraph 1, but the committee broke the appropriation down into two paragraphs, paragraph 2 carrying the appropriation for administrative expenses. The sole purpose of this amendment is to make the inhibition against the employment of aliens applicable to both paragraphs in the bill which carry money.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All this section regarding the National Youth Administration is legislation on an appropriation bill, but it was made in order under a rule. This is merely a perfecting amendment. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 12. No person shall be employed or retained in employment in any administrative position, or in any supervisory position, on any project under the appropriation in paragraph 1 unless such person before engaging in such employment subscribes to the following oath:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office (or employment) on which I am about to enter (or which I now occupy). So help me God."

The National Youth Administrator shall designate administrative and supervisory employees to administer such oath, but no fee shall be charged therefor.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 46, line 6, after the figure "1", insert "or paragraph 2."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, the same explanation is applicable to this amendment as to the one proposed to paragraph 10. It is simply a perfecting amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 13. No portion of the appropriation in paragraph 1 shall be used to pay any compensation to any person who advocates, or who is a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the Government of the United States through force or violence.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 46, line 20, after the figure "1", insert "or paragraph 2."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the same purpose as the other two amendments which have been adopted, that is, to make these restrictions apply to the entire appropriation, which has now been broken down into two paragraphs.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 14. The provisions of Executive Order No. 7916, dated June 24, 1938, shall not apply to positions the compensation of which is payable from the appropriations in paragraphs 1 and 2, and such appropriations shall not be available for the compensation of the incumbent of any position placed in the competitive classified civil service of the United States after January 10, 1939.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSPECK: On pages 46 and 47, strike out all of paragraph 14.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, the relief bill which was passed last year contained a provision restraining the President from putting under civil service employees paid out of relief appropriations. On the floor the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] offered an amendment to limit that restriction to employees of W. P. A. When the bill got over to the Senate the prohibition was made applicable to all employees paid out of relief funds. This paragraph carries the same prohibition against the effectiveness of an Executive order issued by the President, and would carry that prohibition into effect as of July 1, 1940, and for 1 year thereafter.

Since that time the House has passed by a vote of almost 2 to 1 the bill H. R. 960, which removes all restrictions on the power of the President to extend the civil service to the employees in the newer agencies and in some cases to employees in the old agencies, with the exception of employees of W. P. A. This bill does not deal with W. P. A., and I am at a loss to understand why the committee should continue this prohibition which the House has voted against in passing the bill H. R. 960. I hope the Committee may adopt this amendment and eliminate this restriction which is placed upon the power of the President which exists under the general civil-service law to extend the application of the civil-service law to these employees.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. Has H. R. 960 become a law yet?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; it has not. It is pending in the Senate. Of course, if it does not become a law, then the President will not have that power; but if it does become a law and should pass prior to the passage of this appropriation bill, this prohibition would still hold good against the language of H. R. 960.

I hope the Committee will adopt the amendment. I am going to offer an amendment to the next paragraph for the same purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the desire of my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia, to extend the provisions of the civil service to all Government organizations, and I feel that I join with all of you in believing that he has accomplished very creditable work along those lines. However, we on the committee felt that in view of the provision carried in the bill for the present fiscal year which is applicable to the employees of the National Youth Administration, in view of the fact that Congress has not yet taken action by proper legislation to make this a permanent organization, in view of the fact that under the very terms of the bill you are considering, it would expire on June 30, 1941, unless further legislation is passed by Congress, and in view of the further fact that the Ramspeck bill is still pending and has not been finally acted on by the Congress to fix the status of all Government workers, it would be unwise at this time for the committee to undertake to permit by this legislation the employees of this organization to be covered into the civil service.

May I say that if you want these employees covered into the civil service, which is the objective that my friend hopes may be achieved by Executive order, you ought to put even more money in the bill than you have placed in it so far, because their being covered into civil service will necessarily involve considerable increases in salaries of supervisory personnel.

For example, the supervisors of projects are paid on the average about $90 per month, and the National Youth Administration is able to get competent persons for salaries of that kind. This, of course, is field service, not within the provisions of the Classification Act; but it is representative of salaries being paid by this organization which, in Washington, would be considerably increased if under civil service.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I will yield in a moment.

I am not saying that these salaries are sufficient in amount, but I do say that if all of the employees of the National Youth Administration are covered into civil service, the salary expense item will necessarily be considerably in excess of what it is under the provisions of the bill as we have prepared it.

I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think my colleague is in error in his statement because the civil-service law does not affect salaries. The Classification Act regulates salaries and only applies to employees in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TARVER. Yes; I understand, but classification of these employees will take place if they are covered into the civil service; and when they are classified, in my judgment, the salaries of most of them will be increased.

Now, with regard to the legislative situation, if the Ramspeck bill passes the Senate and is approved by the President after the passage of this appropriation bill, the Ramspeck bill, whatever its provisions may be, will take precedence over the provisions of this bill; and if, when this bill reaches the Senate and is ready for action by the Senate, the Ramspeck bill shall already have been enacted into law, which I do not anticipate will be the case, because I think this bill will undoubtedly pass first, yet the Senate should, and undoubtedly would, take action to remove from this bill any provisions which might be in conflict with the Ramspeck bill. So I see no possibility of the situation arising on account of which my colleague is concerned. If his bill is enacted into law after the enactment of the pending bill, it will certainly repeal any conflicting provision of the pending bill; and if it is enacted into law before the enactment of the pending bill, then certainly the Senate will take out of the bill any provision which might be in conflict with it. So I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCORMACK). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 15. In carrying out the purposes of the appropriation in paragraph 2, the National Youth Administrator, subject to the approval of the Federal Security Administrator, is authorized to accept and utilize voluntary and uncompensated services, to appoint and compensate, without regard to civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, officers and employees, and to utilize, with the consent of the head of the Federal agency by which they are employed, Federal officers and employees, and with the consent of the State or local government, State and local officers and employees at such compensation (without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended) as shall be determined by the National Youth Administrator to be necessary, and to prescribe their authorities, duties, responsibilities, and tenure.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSPECK: On page 47, in line 10, after the word "compensate," strike out the word "without" and strike out all of line 11, and in line 12, down to the words "as amended."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, this amendment deals with future appointments in the National Youth Administration. We are setting up now for the first time in the National Youth Administration a substantive law creating a permanent organization, and in this paragraph it is provided that the employees may be selected by the National Youth Administrator, subject to the approval of the Federal Security Administrator, without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, which means, of course, that all future appointments in the National Youth Administration shall be patronage appointments and shall not be subjected to the general law passed by Congress in 1923, fixing like pay for like work in the Government service in the District of Columbia.

As I said a while ago, during the speech of my colleague from Georgia, the Classification Act as it now stands does not apply to positions outside of the District of Columbia and therefore it would not apply to the project supervisors, because it only applies to the departmental employees located in the District of Columbia.

I do not think the Congress ought to continue to eliminate new appointments from the civil-service law, and for the purpose of giving my colleagues the opportunity of voting on that question I am offering this amendment and I hope it may be adopted.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the action which has just been taken by the Committee of the Whole on the amendment offered to the preceding paragraph, the adoption of this amendment would bring about a very difficult situation. The language which you have allowed to remain in the bill provides that the amounts appropriated in the bill shall not be available for the compensation of the incumbent of any position placed in the competitive classified civil service of the United States after January 10, 1939. Now, if the amendment now offered by my colleague from Georgia should be adopted, the provision in the succeeding paragraph allowing the National Youth Administrator to appoint, without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, would be stricken out, and he could not appoint without regard to that act, and yet, if he appointed with regard to the provisions of the Classification Act, the appointee could not be paid any money. So it seems to me it necessarily follows that this amendment also must be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAR. 17. In making separations from the Federal service, or furloughs without pay to last as long as 3 months, of persons employed within the District of Columbia, under the provisions of paragraph 2, the appointing power shall give preference, as nearly as good administration will warrant, in retention to appointees from States that have not received their share of appointments according to population: Provided, however, That soldiers and sailors, and marines, the widows of such, or the wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines, who themselves are not qualified, but whose wives are qualified to hold a position in the Government service, shall be given preference in retention, in their several grades and classes, where their ratings are good or better.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I feel that the RECORD would not be complete in view of the vote we took this morning without this additional explanation. I think it is safe to say that there are certain people who may have voted against the Johnson amendment who are very, very vigorously in favor of the N. Y. A. I place myself in that class, and I rise to state to you these simple facts, so that the RECORD will be clear and show once and for all what has been done.

It will be observed that the committee reported in the bill an appropriation of $85,000,000 for the N. Y. A. That included $79,675,000 for the expense of the various activities of the N. Y. A., $5,290,000 for administration and $75,000 for printing and binding, a total of $85,000,000. Under the Johnson amendment, which you have adopted, you have voted $97,085,000 in the first item, $5,290,000 for administration, $75,000 for printing and binding, or a total of $102,450,000. They had available for the last fiscal year in the N. Y. A. $100,450,000. You have, therefore, given to the N. Y. A. $2,000,000 more than was available in the last fiscal year. It has been attempted to justify that increase as being due to the fact that the record discloses that the N. Y. A. this year would have to assume disbursing costs that were formerly assumed by the Treasury Department, and those costs amount to $650,000. It is also claimed that they will have to assume some accounting costs next year that are not assumed in the present fiscal year by the Department, and those costs are estimated by Mr. Williams to amount to $465,000, a total of $1,115,000.

Therefore it definitely appears that you have voted $885,000 more than anybody thought was necessary for the N. Y. A. Even the most radical proponents of N. Y. A. have never asked the amount you have voted this morning. You have given them $885,000 more, including the assumption of disbursing costs and the accounting costs than was allocated to the N. Y. A. in the present fiscal year. Here is another fact which I think will be interesting, and which I think the Members of Congress and the public should know. If you will turn to page 615 of the hearings you will find that Mr. Williams testified as follows:

I asked originally for $125,000,000 for this year; but the request went in to the President from the Budget Bureau for $100,000,000. That was the request that was actually transmitted to the President.

The President's Budget reduced that amount to $85,000,000. Place the responsibility for the original reduction where it belongs. I am one of those who believe in the N. Y. A. I demonstrated that in my argument before this House. I vigorously approve of it, but I cannot in good conscience vote $885,000 more than anybody has asked for N. Y. A. activities for the next fiscal year; and I think the record should be kept straight, because I cannot conceive that many of the gentlemen on my right voted with the knowledge that they were voting $885,000 more than anybody asked. Had you adopted the Collins amendment, there might have been some sense to the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks which I made a while ago in moving to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (41 U. S. C. 5) shall not be construed to apply to any purchase with funds appropriated under this title when the aggregate amount involved in such purchase does not exceed the sum of $100.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order to the language in lines 10, 11, 12, and 13, page 50.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri reserves the point of order and is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to make a point of order to this section or against other similar provisions in the bill, but I want to call attention of members of the Committee on Appropriations to just what they are doing and above all what they have done. I think few Members know what section 3709 of the Revised Statutes provides. Dozens and dozens of limitations have been placed on appropriation bills affecting this section.

Section 3709 of the Revised Statutes was put on the books for the purpose of requiring advertisements for procurement—in other words, bids for Government supplies. In this instance the Committee on Appropriations provides section 3709 shall not apply in this case to purchases of $100 and less. That is not so objectionable nor are the similar provisions in this bill, but when you make the amount $300 or $500 it is objectionable.

What has happened in the past? Among the dozens and dozens of provisions that you have added to appropriation bills you have gone so far in a number of instances as to remove purchases from the provisions of the statutes entirely. I do not know whether you are aware of it or not, but one of those provisions gives the War Department the power to buy all the medicine that it needs for the entire United States Army without asking for bids, if it so desires. The same thing can be done under another provision, insofar as the Department of Agriculture is concerned, in the purchase of poisons to exterminate insects. Does anybody tell me that is sound business?

The reason I shall not insist on my point of order at this time is that I have in preparation a bill which I hope will be reported in a few days, wherein it is provided by amendment to section 3709, for purchases without advertising when approved by department head or agency of supplies under $100 and also giving the head of a department or agency in an emergency the right to make purchases without advertising.

I hope the Committee on Appropriations will be careful in the future, and if it places any limitation in these bills it will be confined to $100 because if any bill is brought in with a provision in excess of $100 it is my purpose to insist on a point of order which I will make.

As I say, in reference to this bill the amount comes within the bill I expect to report, so I am not going to insist on a point of order.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. Prior to this bill the amount of the limitation has been $300. Our subcommittee reduced it to $100.

Mr. COCHRAN. I know that and commend the gentleman. I say I have no objection to this $100 limitation. I am glad to see that the gentleman deemed it was advisable to reduce it from $300. I do not say that any Government official is taking advantage of the exemptions, but I do say that if one does he should not alone be blamed but the Congress should be also held to account for giving him the opportunity to abuse the privilege. Stop it before it is too late. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The reservation of the point of order was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries: For three Board members of the National Labor Relations Board and other personnel services of the Board in the District of Columbia and elsewhere necessary in performing the duties imposed by law or in pursuance of law, $2,072,000.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURDOCK of Utah: On page 53, line 21, strike out "$2,072,000" and insert "$2,320,000."

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I hope the gentlewoman will not insist on the point of order.

Mrs. NORTON. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that when we reached this point in the bill, to wit, the appropriations for the National Labor Relations Board in the administration of the National Labor Relations Act, the friends of labor would fill every seat on the floor of this House, because, in my opinion, no amendment which has been or will be offered to this bill is quite as important to the cause of labor as the amendment which I have offered. My amendment simply restores to the amount of the Budget estimate the appropriation for salaries of the personnel of the National Labor Relations Board.

Labor legislation, from the time of the introduction of the first bill in Congress for the improvement of conditions for the great mass of American labor, has had rough going. The friends of labor legislation have had to battle every inch of the way for each and every item intended to improve the working conditions, the economic and social position, and other matters pertinent to the subject. Great barriers have been raised by able legislators to thwart and impede and hamper every bill submitted to Congress in behalf of labor. After the legislative battle had been won, then labor found the going just as tough, just as hard, with just as many barriers and hurdles to overcome, before the judiciary, as they found it in the Halls of Congress. Acts such as the Clayton Act, the very purpose of which was to aid labor against adverse court decisions, were almost immediately turned into weapons against labor instead of weapons in its behalf, as was intended by Congress.

The friends of labor in Congress, led by Mr. LaGuardia in the House and Mr. NORRIS of the the Senate, were successful in enacting the LaGuardia-Norris Act—another milestone of progress in labor legislation. Collective bargaining and rights protecting independent organization found their first encouragement under Federal legislation in the N. I. R. A., but because of defects in this act and a none-too-favorable judiciary, these great fundamental principles, the very cornerstones of protection for the man who labors, were soon found to be ineffectual and were finally stricken down by the Supreme Court when it held this act unconstitutional.

But almost immediately after the striking down of the N. I. R. A., that indomitable statesman, Senator WAGNER, began to rebuild on the fundamental principles of collective bargaining and freedom and independence in organization. Then after months of hearings and one of the most bitterly fought legislative battles that has ever been fought under the dome of the Capitol, where every inch of ground was only won after the most persistent efforts on the part of the friends of labor in the National Congress, the National Labor Relations Act was passed. After its passage by Congress and approval by the President, it received about the same reception that had been accorded every other piece of labor legislation. A hostile press, joined by hostile industrialists, buttressed by the keenest legal brains in the United States, began a devastating, destructive, and incessant war against this magna carta of labor, this act which meant the emancipation of the men and women upon whose shoulders this great Nation largely depends.

No act ever passed by the Congress met with more criticism, more condemnation, and more hostile attack than the National Labor Relations Act. Even before a Board was appointed to administer the act we find the unprecedented, deplorable, and despicable spectacle of 58 Liberty League lawyers, men whose profession solemnly devolves upon them more than any other group in the United States the responsibility of upholding the law of the land duly passed by the Congress and approved by the President, banding themselves together and, under the deceptive guise of legalistic vigilantes, jointly issuing their solemn and, as they styled it, well-considered opinion that the National Labor Relations Act was unconstitutional. Not being satisfied with this, they took the next step of inciting and encouraging disobedience to the act, rebellion against it, on the grounds that they had determined it was unconstitutional; unwilling to abide by the deliberate and well-considered action of the Congress and the approval of the President under the democratic processes of the Constitution, unwilling to await action by the Supreme Court, they maliciously and deliberately endeavored to usurp the powers of the Court for the destruction of this law passed for the benefit of the workers. Happily, under the Constitution of the United States this unprecedented, unlawful, and despicable act of this group of lawyers was not given much weight by the Supreme Court, which, in April 1937, decided that the act was constitutional.

A Board was appointed to administer the act. And, may I say, there never was an agency in the Government confronted with a more difficult, a more thankless, a more misunderstood job than the Board which was appointed to administer the National Labor Relations Act. Not only were they confronted from the time of their appointment with the bitter hostility of the traditional foes of labor, but in the ranks of labor itself two great hostile factions arose, adding enormously to the already difficult position of the National Labor Relations Board. In my opinion, the Board has vigorously and courageously administered the act. Mistakes have been made, of course, but did human agency ever do anything without mistakes?

Coming now to the matter immediately in hand and to which my amendment is directed, I call your attention to the fact that the Appropriations Committee, acting on the recommendation and the report of the subcommittee handling this legislation, the chairman of which is the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER], saw fit to reduce the appropriation for the three members of the National Labor Relations Board, and other personnel services of the Board in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, necessary in performing the duties imposed by law, or in pursuance of law, from $3,180,000 to $2,072,000, a total of $248,000, itemized in their report as follows:

Field examiners	$18,000
Clerical staff	21,000
Field attorneys	48,000
Administrative Division	20,000
Trial Examining Division	57,000
Division of Economic Research	45,600
Legal Division:
Litigation section	15,400
Review section	18,000
Reduction in salaries of employees given more than two-step administrative promotions in 1939	5,000

As I understand the duties of the Appropriations Committee of this House, it is their province to consider the amount of appropriations necessary to carry on the functions and the administration of acts passed by Congress. Certainly, if they recommend reduction of an item of appropriation they are within their rights, they are exercising the prerogatives delegated to them by the House, and I have no quarrel with this delegation of authority. But it is my understanding that this committee has absolutely no right, under the rules of this House, to change existing law in an appropriation bill. If it has no right to change existing law directly in an appropriation bill, then most certainly it has no right, power, or authority to change existing law, or even attempt to change existing law, by the indirect method which this subcommittee and the Appropriations Committee are attempting in connection with the item of $45,600 set out above, and which is required to maintain the division of economic research set up by the National Labor Relations Act. But it is by this questionable method, by this unauthorized method, that the elimination of this item of appropriation for the division of economic research of the National Labor Relations Board is being attempted.

I call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to page 36 of the report accompanying this appropriation bill. The last sentence in the first paragraph on that page reads as follows:

It is felt, however, that no need exists for a division of economic research, and it is expected that this section will be entirely eliminated.

Why did the subcommittee, and why did the Appropriations Committee, not put a proviso in the bill itself to do directly what they are attempting to do, and probably will do, by this questionable method, indirectly? The answer is this: If such a proviso were contained in the bill, it would be subject to a point of order and stricken out. Knowing this, but intent on achieving by indirection something that could not be done directly, they put the statement set out above in their report.

It will probably be argued this afternoon that this admonition contained in the report is not mandatory, that the Board could ignore it, which, of course, it could lawfully do, but Mr. Chairman, the power that controls the purse strings can accomplish, by this indirect method, more than it could accomplish if such a proviso had been put in the bill. Is there an agency of the Government, is there a Board or Department that would dare to ignore the admonition contained in this report? My answer is "No," and I am just as sure as I am standing here that the subcommittee and the Appropriations Committee knew what the effect of such an admonition would be. My term in Congress has not been long, but in the nearly 8 years that I have been here this is the first time I have seen this procedure resorted to for the purpose of avoiding the raising of a point of order, but nevertheless with the intent of accomplishing the purpose of changing existing law.

Now, let us consider for a minute whether it will change existing law. What is the law that will be affected? We find in the National Labor Relations Act this clause:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the Board to appoint individuals for the purpose of conciliation or mediation (or for statistical work), where such service may be obtained from the Department of Labor.

This clause without doubt shows that the question of maintaining an economic research division was considered by Congress; it indicates clearly that Congress had in mind the Statistical and economic research bureau of the Department of Labor, now so ably administered by Dr. Lubin; but it just as conclusively shows that Congress considered that the National Labor Relations Board would probably need statistical work and economic research performed that they could not get from the Department of Labor. It shows conclusively that Congress did not want a duplication of effort, did not want a duplication of expense, but that Congress knew that economic data and statistical data would be necessary in the efficient administration of the National Labor Relations Act. It was for this purpose that the above clause was written into the act, giving to the Board, at least by implication, full right and authority to supply itself with any and all statistics and to perform any and all economic research that it could not get from the Department of Labor through its own personnel. This very subcommittee and the Appropriations Committee of the House have, time and again, construed the clause set out above as meaning just what I say it means today. They have construed this law to mean what I contend that it means today by carrying an item in the appropriation bill each year since the enactment of the law for the division of economic research. Mr. Chairman, I have carefully analyzed the hearings on this item, and, because they are brief, I include them in toto so that the RECORD will be complete and clear on this question.

EXHIBIT A

DIVISION OF ECONOMIC RESEARCH

Mr. TARVER. The figures at the top of page 29 will go into the record at this point.

(The figures referred to are as follows:)

	Total number of positions	Total salaries
Fiscal year 1940, estimate	15	$45,600
Fiscal year 1941, estimate	15	45,600

Mr. TARVER. It appears that you intend to retain the same number of employees as you have for the present year.

SALARIES OF PERSONNEL

There are some questions that we want to ask you with regard to the activities of this division of economic research. What are the salaries attaching to those positions?

Mrs. STERN. I will describe the salaries. They are in the professional classification in the Budget.

Mr. MADDEN. That is on page 215 of the Budget.

Mrs. STERN. The Chief Economist is classified as grade 7, P–7, that is professional classification, receiving $6,500 a year.

There is one senior economist, grade P–5, $4,600.

There is one associate industrial economist, grade P–4, at $3,800.

There are three associate economists, grade P–3, averaging $3,200 each.

There are five assistant economists, grade P–2, averaging $2,626 each.

There are four junior economists each receiving $2,000.

ACTIVITIES OF DIVISION

Mr. TARVER. May I ask if the duties of these people are to prepare case statistics to enlighten on the activities of the Board such as the numbers and different types of cases?

Mrs. STERN. Yes; that is one part of it.

Mr. TARVER. Would you explain what the other parts of it are.

Mr. MADDEN. The preparation of a Labor Relations case for trial very often involves an investigation of economic problems. Take this question of jurisdiction. When the Board first undertakes a case in a particular industry, it is necessary to make an investigation of the way in which that industry in general and the particular plant or employer does its business; where its raw materials are coming from; where its goods are shipped to.

Now a lawyer could make that investigation but he does not know where to look for the information the way that one who has had some education in economics does; that is, you may get the information from papers filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission. You may get it out of such books as Moody's Manual, Dun & Bradstreet, or other financial sources. You may get it from other trade magazines. You may get information about labor organizations and their history. You may get these out of reports of conventions of labor organizations. The economist can do that chore much more quickly than a lawyer can because he does know that source material and knows where to go for it.

Mr. TARVER. Their work, as I understand it, consists in addition to the collection of statistics regarding cases which have been handled by the Board, in the preparation of the evidence particularly that of expert witnesses to be used by the review and legal division in the performance of their duties?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; either in the preparation of materials for the trial of the case, things to be put into evidence at the hearings, or else on the other side assisting the review division of the Board in the analysis of the economic facts that may be in evidence.

Mr. TARVER. Do they contact for you expert witnesses and go over with those witnesses the facts with regard to any particular pending matter?

Mr. MADDEN. They may.

Mr. TARVER. That is, of what value their evidence would be?

Mr. MADDEN. They may. We do not have many cases in which we use expert witnesses. In a handful of cases our chief economist has, like other Government departments do, himself taken the stand as an expert and has testified to certain things as an expert. Very often the employer hires an expert and puts him on the witness stand in his behalf. The actual giving of expert testimony is not a very large part of their job although the chief economist has done it a few times. Very frequently the transcript of the evidence and the exhibits which come into the Board may contain a mass of figures and employment figures, such as the number of hours worked by each man over perhaps a considerable period, and there may be figures concerning hundreds of men, because the problem for the Board may be this: Whether 10 members of the union were discriminated against when they were laid off and other people were not laid off.

Well, the answer may be right in this mass of figures and somebody has to settle down and go through those records and distill out of it the answer that those records will disclose. Now, an economist can do that more quickly and more intelligently than a lawyer, because he has a certain technique and methods whereby he can tabulate things like that and bring forth what the right answer is.

Mr. TARVER. Who is the head of this division?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. David Saposs.

Mr. TARVER. I understand that Dr. Saposs testified before the Smith committee that he had some 14 economists and some 30 persons in all working and making up the staff of his division. What employees does he have besides these 15 who are listed here?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whether he meant to say that that included all the stenographers and typists.

Mrs. STERN. And the clerical help.

Mr. MADDEN. I might say at the moment with reference to those 15, I am sure that he has in that division, in addition to the 15 professional people, a few people who are classified as clerks. But they are economic clerks, so to speak. I mean, they are not typists or stenographers in the ordinary sense. They are persons who do have some training in the technique of what these other people do and who do these economic chores or help to do them.

Mr. TARVER. Among the other information collated by this division, is there information as to labor strikes and labor conditions, and other material of that type?

Mr. MADDEN. No; we get all that information about strikes and the causes of strikes from the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor.

RELATION OF WORK TO THAT OF BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS

Mr. TARVER. What I am interested in there is whether or not you are duplicating work of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in that field?

Mr. MADDEN. We are not. The Chief of the Bureau of Labor Statistics testified before the Smith committee on Wednesday, and he said in that testimony that we were not duplicating anything that he and his Bureau were doing.

Mr. TARVER. Do you need 14 economists to analyze this material and prepare evidence for the review and legal divisions? And also to do these various other things which you have outlined here? Is not a good part of that work, such as the collection of statistics regarding cases that you have had come under your jurisdiction, work of a type which might be performed by one who is not trained as an economist, or a lower-paid type of employee? Fourteen is a good many economists to have in one organization, it seems.

Mr. MADDEN. If your idea is that it could be done by cheaper help——

Mr. TARVER. By cutting down the number of your economists and perhaps increasing or leaving at its present level the number of your other employees in that division could you not handle that work satisfactorily?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I cannot tell you, Mr. Chairman, about this division, any more than I can about Mr. Fahy's division or any other division, that I know of my personal knowledge that every person in there is needed. I take Mr. Fahy's word to a considerable extent as to the needs of the legal division. I have no reason to think that he would pad his division and pretend to need the help that he does not need. And in the same way I cannot be absolutely certain that every person in the economics division is needed. But I know that every addition to the present staff has been gotten by the chief of the division by great pressure on the Board and great argument to the Board that he needed this additional position and that he has convinced the Board that he did need it. I cannot say at all that he does not.

Mr. TARVER. I believe that section 4 of the act under which you operate provides that you shall not appoint persons for the purpose of obtaining statistical information where such service may be obtained from the Department of Labor, does it not?

Mr. FAHY. Yes; there is that provision in the act. But as I said, Dr. Lubin, the Commissioner of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, testified before the Smith committee on the 28th of February.

Mr. TARVER. I do not think that we would care to have any excerpts from some witness' testimony there without having the others' and I do not believe we would care to go into that more deeply than I have undertaken to do in this rather brief and superficial examination.

QUALIFICATIONS AND SALARIES OF ECONOMISTS

Mr. HARE. Do you have any special qualifications to apply to your economists?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; those are all civil-service positions, the economists' positions.

Mr. HARE. In other words, they have special training in that field?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and they are obtained from the Civil Service Commission. We simply call upon the Commission.

Mr. HARE. I think the question is, if you can obtain them from the Commission, Judge TARVER's inquiry was that probably that instead of using 14 or 15 highly trained technical men that they might be reduced to a half a dozen economists who are trained to take statistics and analyze and interpret their meaning and the remainder on the force might be what we know in most of the departments as statistical clerks who could obtain this information by research or perhaps from some other department of the Government. I gather that that was the purpose of Judge TARVER's inquiry, to see whether or not this item could be reduced.

Mrs. STERN. There are on this staff 3 economists at $3,800 and the balance of the 15 are below $3,800. As a matter of fact the balance of the latter is $3,200, or below that.

Mr. MADDEN. Twelve of the fifteen are $3,200, are they not?

Mrs. STERN. Or below. As a matter of fact, you can say that 9 are at $2,600 or below. The greater proportion of those people who at most constitute a very small percentage of the total amount devoted to salaries are below $3,200 and they in turn preside over a clerical staff which answers to their directions in looking up material, and so forth. And they must be responsible, of necessity, knowing that the statistics have got to be put in a form where the correct conclusions can be drawn. This is not just statistical material, of course, but it is economic research material. You would not think, of course, turning over an important case to a low-class lawyer without being under the supervision of a high-class trial lawyer.

Mr. HARE. The thing that strikes me as being strange is that you have here a requirement of technical training, highly technical training for economists, and then you have quite a number of others where no training and experience is required at all in their work. That is what has been testified to here.

Mr. MADDEN. Of these economists there is scarcely one of them that I would send out to be a field examiner or a regional director. They are not just that kind of people.

Mr. HARE. The point that I am getting at is that it is strange to me that you are able to get these highly technical trained people at a salary lower than you get people that have no requirements as to experience and training.

Mr. MADDEN. That is just the way the market is.

Mr. HARE. And with reference to those no experience is required.

Mr. MADDEN. That is just the way the market is. I think that it is perhaps unfortunate that some of these people, nearly all of these economists have a Ph. D. degree which would mean 7 years of higher education, but it just happens that the market at this time for economists is in that state.

Mr. HARE. It is flooded more than the market for lawyers, is that it?

Mr. MADDEN. And it happens also that you can turn out economists more or less en masse. I mean you can take almost any kind of individual and if you put him through a certain type of education he can do this kind of work. But this other business of tact, judgment, and experience, and all that kind of thing that you need to go out and confront a savage employer and a savage labor leader is something else again.

Mr. HARE. I would not want to argue with you on that point at all. The point that I am trying to get at is to endorse the position taken by Judge TARVER. The point which occurred to me in reading these figures here and the justification for them is whether or nct the amount of work in this Board was such as to require the employment of 14 or 15 highly trained technical economists. There is a question in my mind as to whether or not you could not get people at smaller salaries to do some of the work.

Mr. MADDEN. You would have to start pretty low when, as Mrs. Stern says, 9 out of 15 get $2,600 or less. You cannot go very much below that and pay them what a first-class stenographer gets.

Mr. HARE. Then the next question I would ask myself is whether or not if you are getting these men for $2,600 whether they are really highly technical trained economists or whether or not they are just called economists by name.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I think that again is a question of the market. I think it is probably unfortunate that these people with plenty of education and plenty of capacity in their lines are as available at these low prices.

Mr. ENGEL. In other words, you are paying doctors of philosophy $2,000 and doctors of hard knocks $7,000; is that the idea?

Mr. MADDEN. That is the way it works.

Mr. ENGEL. These salaries totaling $45,600—that division is all taken up by economists?

Mr. MADDEN. That is right.

Mr. ENGEL. What other salaries—they have stenographers in that Division?

Mrs. STERN. Yes.

TOTAL COST OF DIVISION

Mr. ENGEL. What is the total cost of the total number of positions that you have in this division of economic research and the total cost of the Division?

Mrs. STERN. I have to give you that. As I explained here in the justification, the entire clerical administration of everyone of the staff is included in that first item of departmental service that you looked at on page 27. May I furnish this for the record? I think it would probably come out something like 15 clerical and stenographic people.

Mr. ENGEL. Are there any other people in those, in that division, outside of clerical and stenographic people?

Mrs. STERN. No, sir.

Mr. ENGEL. Would you furnish that?

Mrs. STERN. Except these economists.

Mr. ENGEL. I mean in addition to them.

Mrs. STERN. Oh, yes. Of course.

Mr. TARVER. Will you furnish a break-down of the cost of the entire division, including the economists and the clerical and stenographic help?

Mrs. STERN. Yes.

(The information is as follows:)

Cost of personnel, Division of Economic Research

	Number	Amount
Economists	15	$45,900
Clerical and stenographic	14	23,700
Total	29	69,600

Mr. ENGEL. Do you know what the salary grading is of a statistician?

Mr. SHOVER. The grades of statisticians vary.

Mr. ENGEL. What do those salaries run to?

Mr. SHOVER. Under the civil-service rating the lowest is for junior professional statistician, $2,000.

Mr. ENGEL. And if you change this classification from economist to statistician you will still have to pay the same salary practically?

Mr. MADDEN. I have heard of such a classification as a statistical clerk but I suppose it is below $2,000. It may be $1,600 or something like that.

Mrs. STERN. Most of these people are not doing statistical work.

GROWTH OF DIVISION

Mr. TARVER. How many economists did you have in this division in the fiscal year 1939?

Mrs. STERN. The same number.

Mr. MADDEN. In 1939, are you sure of that?

Mrs. STERN. In 1939, yes; I am quite sure we had the same number and the same number for 1940 and 1941.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman just stated off the record that it was gradually worked up by this number as the need therefor developed. It seems to me you have had the same number for the last 2 or 3 fiscal years.

Mr. MADDEN. I would not be sure of that. My impression would be that there were probably two or three added in 1940 but I am not sure.

Mr. HARE. You anticipate an increase?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I would say this, that we did not start out back yonder to set up an abstract economic division with 15 economists in it. We started out with the chief economist and some very small number of assistants and whether it was done before 1939 or not, why, the positions were added only one or two at a time and as each one of them, as my colleague Mr. Edwin Smith will testify, Mr. Saposs had to argue pretty hard with the Board to get it because I think it is always hard for people outside a particular profession or particular line of work to understand what the fellows are doing in the other line of work. I think it is hard for the economists to understand why it takes so many lawyers and what, if anything, the lawyers do over there. They are busy, and I hope, usefully busy.

Mrs. STERN. May I give you the figures you asked for? There were 11 men in the Budget of 1939 as submitted in the estimate of 1940.

Mr. HARE. Did you anticipate an increase in this, as I judge from the justification there?

Mr. MADDEN. No, sir. Those are people who are employed at the present time.

Mr. TARVER. Our figures here show 13 for 1939 instead of 11. On page 215 of the bill there is 1 at $6,500, 1 at $4,600, 3 at $3,200, 5 at $2,620, and 3 at $2,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That would be 13.

Mrs. STERN. Well, as I said, I took my figures from the estimate submitted in the 1940 Budget.

Mr. HARE. Going back to my inquiry as to whether or not you anticipated this increase in this force. I notice in the justification, however, you say that the growing complexity of the jurisdictional problems as the Board approaches the outer periphery, and questions on merits of cases, as employers exercise more subtlety in violations might well be expected to entail an increase in this staff.

Mr. MADDEN. That means if you gentlemen want to give us a little more money.

Mr. HARE. It is not a question of what we gentlemen want to give you. It is a question of what the work is and what you are going to require. That is what I want to get at.

Mr. MADDEN. It is like a good many other things, I suppose. This is an honest statement of what we think we need, namely, that we need more such people.

Mr. HARE. Do you anticipate that there will be an increased lack of cooperation on the part of employers in this work?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I should say that our cases probably will not increase in number but our experience is that those who do violate the law learn how to do it more subtly than they used to in the good old days when they did not think it was the law.

Mr. HARE. Then this word "subtlety" here is used in the wrong place. They cooperate more adroitly than they violate the law subtly?

Mr. MADDEN. No; that is not what I mean. I meant that those who do violate the law violate it more subtly and make, therefore, a more difficult case to prepare for trial than what we used to have.

Why, in the beginning, the employer if he wanted to discharge a man for being in union activities he said so and then when he came in to the trial he appeared and pleaded specially that the law was unconstitutional and turned his back and walked out of the hearing. And so the trial of the case on the facts was fairly easy. But nowadays, of course, nothing like that happens, and so if one is violating the law he does it in a way that makes it pretty hard to catch him, and you have to investigate very carefully and very fully in order to make a case. That is definitely our experience.

Mr. HARE. And with that experience you would naturally expect an increase in your staff?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, according to what the Bureau of the Budget has done here we are not going to get an increase.

Mrs. STERN. The same thing will hold true if you read through the work and requirements of the legal division. And the same thing happens, as a matter of fact, with respect to the field staff. We have a very tight budget here for the work we have to do.

I challenge any member of the subcommittee handling this bill today, any member of the Appropriations Committee, or any Member of the House, to point to one syllable of substantial evidence which will support them in their destruction of the division of economic research of the National Labor Relations Board. In finding no evidence to support this action on the part of the subcommittee and the Appropriations Committee, I began wondering why it was done. I contacted the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee. I asked him the question point-blank if it was the accusations made against Dr. Saposs before the Dies committee and before the Smith committee that caused his subcommittee to take the action which they have taken. He assured me emphatically that it was not. I accepted his statement, and for that reason will not, this afternoon, go into the question of the political philosophy of Dr. Saposs. In his philosophy I am not interested. I hold no brief for him nor for any other employee of the National Labor Relations Board. He and they must stand upon their own record. But Mr. Chairman, I do hold a brief for orderly parliamentary procedure in this, the greatest deliberative legislative body in the world. Seldom a day passes in this House that we do not hear somebody refer to the solemnity of our parliamentary rules of procedure. Without such rules we could not function for a day. Without such rules, chaos instead of order would confront us here in this great Chamber. I consider what is attempted here today in this effort to destroy the division of economic research of the National Labor Relations Board to be a violation of the solemn rules of this House. While I have no doubt about the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, Judge TARVER, that Dr. Saposs and his political and economic and social statements and writings had no bearing whatever on the action of his subcommittee on this item, there are other Members of this body who have indicated that their vote will be cast on that basis, and I am sure that in the argument this subject will be the first target of those who oppose my amendment restoring the amount of the appropriation to the National Labor Relations Board to the Budget estimate. But I intend to confine my argument to the rules of the House and to the devastating and destructive effect of eliminating the division of economic research in the administration of the National Relations Act.

Who was it that pioneered in bringing to the attention of the courts the importance, in the solution of legal questions, of economic data and information? It was none other than that distinguished Justice of the Supreme Court, Hon. Louis D. Brandeis. From that day back in 1907 until the present time, the importance of economists and economic data in the trial and disposal of litigation has progressively become greater. In every important lawsuit today involving great financial, industrial, economic, and social questions we find the economist sitting right at the side of the great lawyer. The economist has become the right arm of the lawyer in the preparation, in the trial, and in the briefing of legal questions. Under the National Labor Relations Act, one of the first questions confronting the National Labor Relations Board on every charge or complaint filed with them, is the question of jurisdiction under the commerce clause of the Constitution. On this question they must have economic data, they must know the source of raw materials, they must know the transportation problems involved, they must know where the finished products are consumed, they must know how much of the business or the operation of the respondent is intrastate and how much of it is interstate. How can this information be most efficiently and most inexpensively secured? The answer is, by using people specially trained, people who know the sources of such information, and who can efficiently and speedily compile it and analyze it. Absolute necessity prompted the setting up of the division of economic research. It is indispensable in the efficient administration of the act. The result of its elimination and destruction is to handicap and cripple the Board in carrying the benefits of the act to the laborers of America. If this division of economic research is eliminated, we will find the attorneys for the National Labor Relations Board sorely handicapped when, without this help, they walk into the courts and before the trial examiners of the Board, and are confronted by the keenest lawyers in the United States, aided by the outstanding economists of the country.

I wonder if we want such a condition to exist. My answer is, "No"; and I hope that all prejudice and all bias and all fanaticism can be cast aside today, and that our votes on this question will ultimately be cast on the question as to the necessity for such an economic research division in the efficient administration of the National Labor Relations Board. It probably will be argued this afternoon by members of the subcommittee that the case load of the National Labor Relations Board is decreasing. I am happy to admit that there were fewer cases filed in the year ending June 30, 1939, than in the year ending June 30, 1938. To me this indicates a healthy condition. It indicates that the act and its administration are having the proper effect on the relations between the employee and the employer. But, in considering the present work of the Board, we must also consider two other items, which, in my opinion, are very relevant to the issue and must be considered in order to arrive at a proper conclusion. On June 30, 1938, the number of cases pending was 3,778; on June 30, 1939, the number of cases pending was 4,103. Certainly these figures do not indicate that the great load of the Board is less now than it was at the beginning of 1938. We must also take into consideration this fact, that before the constitutionality of the act was declared by the Supreme Court, the defense in the great majority of cases was simply the question of constitutionality. Since the establishment of the law's constitutionality the cases are being more closely tried by the respondents. Every technicality and every issue that can possibly be raised is raised so that the trial of cases on the part of the Board has become more technical and more burdensome, necessitating, of course, more economic data, more economic research. Since the report of the subcommittee has been published and its action has come to the attention of the press, we find that many newspapers which have been severe critics of the National Labor Relations Act and Board in the past are now condemning, in no uncertain terms, the action taken to eliminate the division of economic research. As illustrative of this attack I include below a report from the Christian Science Monitor of March 23, 1940 [see exhibit B], also the column by Ernest K. Lindley appearing in the Washington Post as of Wednesday, March 27 [see exhibit C].

You will have seen by reading from the hearings of the committee, set out above, that Chairman Madden, of the National Labor Relations Board, stressed the fact that the division of economic research had been built up step by step, and only after thorough investigation by the Board of the recommendation of the head of the division. You will see that he considers the economic division of utmost importance to the administration of the act, and that is about the only evidence before the committee on this question. After reading his testimony, and being familiar with the testimony of Dr. Lubin before the Smith committee, I contacted Dr. Leiserson, of the Board, and asked him what he thought of the elimination of the division of economic research. In response to my inquiry, he wrote me the letter, a copy of which is attached. [See exhibit D.]

Inasmuch as I have referred to Dr. Lubin's testimony before the Smith committee, I call your attention to the fact that he very emphatically advised that committee that there was no duplication by the National Labor Relations Board of work being done by his Bureau.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to offer an amendment to restore the Budget figures on this National Labor Board item?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. That is what my amendment does.

Mr. ENGEL. It restores the Budget figures on this appropriation?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. As I understand it, that is what my amendment does.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. As a member of the Appropriations Committee, I am in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment and believe the Budget recommendation should be restored.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. I happened to be at the hearings of the Smith committee when Dr. Saposs was examined. They were not apparently concerned with whether or not he was a factor in the Board's administration. They devoted all their time trying to prove that he was something the evidence did not show he was.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I thank the gentleman from California for this contribution. It is typical of his fairmindedness. I have served with the gentleman from California now for 8 years, and I have always admired his tolerance, his progressive viewpoint, and his ardent adherence to fair play. As to Dr. Saposs, who he is, what he has said, or what he has written, in my opinion, is beside the point that we are discussing today, so I will not go into that question further.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to the fact that there is pending today before the Labor Committee of this House, over which the distinguished lady from New Jersey, MARY NORTON, presides an amendment dealing directly with the question of prohibiting the National Labor Relations Board from maintaining a division of economic research. On the Labor Committee are serving some of the most distinguished Members of this House. Is it fair to them, is it orderly procedure, to attempt indirectly to eliminate this division by a cut in the appropriation instead of awaiting the action of the Labor Committee before taking such a step? Once again I call your attention to the importance of adherence to and compliance with the rules of the House. I earnestly request in behalf of the people for whom the National Labor Relations Act was passed that you do not by this method hamper, impede, and hamstring the administration of this act. I trust that my amendment will be adopted.

REAL LABOR BOARD FIGHT IS ON ECONOMICS ISSUE—SMITH COMMITTEE AND HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS REPORT URGED THAT BOARD'S DIVISION ON ECONOMICS AND RESEARCH BE ABOLISHED—SHAFT IS AIMED AT ITS HEAD, WHO HAS DENIED CHARGES OF COMMUNISTIC LEANINGS

WASHINGTON, March 23.—The present battle against the National Labor Relations Board turns largely in the House on whether or not its division on economics and research should be abolished. The special Smith committee investigating the Board voted 3 to 2 to abolish it; the regular Labor Committee of the House this week rejected the Smith proposal; now the House Appropriations Committee recommends that it be wiped out, and that the $95,000 of economists' salaries be deducted for the Board's appropriations.

For a long time now economists have stood, figuratively, at the elbow of frock-coated lawyers who argued in suave tones labor cases before the nine members of the United States Supreme Court. The use of economic facts in labor cases was introduced dramatically before the black-robed Supreme Court by Louis D. Brandeis in 1907 in Muller v. Oregon, assisted by Josephine Goldmark, in a case which established the reasonableness of general hours legislation for women.

STEPS TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. Brandeis himself was elevated to the Supreme Court, and Felix Frankfurter was substituted as counsel in Bunting v. Oregon in 1916, and a 35-page list of economic and factual sources was included in the brief. Again and again in matters dealing with labor, the same Brandeis-Goldmark-Frankfurter system of economic briefs has been used in recent years or modified to meet special issues. In the Government's unsuccessful effort to outlaw child labor in Hammer v. Dagenhart, both sides offered economic factual material with elaborate citations to support arguments for or against the thesis that child labor is injurious, and subject to Federal control.

The first five cases brought by the Labor Board itself before the Supreme Court featured economic arguments. To prove the constitutionality of the collective-bargaining provisions of the Wagner Act, it was necessary to convince the Court that industrial strikes affect interstate commerce, and result in part from an absence of collective bargaining. The Labor Board established its division of economic research, which is now under congressional attack, with the express purpose of preparing material needed in court presentations, and later extended it to secure guidance in technical industrial matters.

ECONOMICS, NOT LAW

Labor Board officials point with pride to their Supreme Court "score" of 19 orders enforced, and only 2 denied and 68 to 19 in Circuit Courts and attribute the success at least in part to the economic data supplied. In recent cases, with constitutionality assured, economic data have been less frequently used.

How does economics find its way into a law court, where matters are supposed to be decided on constitutional issues?

The Supreme Court supplied the answer itself in Muller v. Oregon, in response to the Brandeis brief which had been attacked as irrelevant by opposing counsel. While pointing out that "constitutional questions, it is true, are not settled by even a consensus of present public opinion" the Court said that "at the same time, when a question of fact is debated and debatable, then "a widespread and long-continued belief concerning it is worthy of consideration. We take judicial cognizance of all matters of general knowledge."

OLD ISSUE REAPPEARS

The same issue came up again in the Labor Board's famous Jones and Laughlin case, in which Chief Justice Hughes cited in a footnote some of the nonlegal economic documents referred to by the Board, in deciding in its favor, although the opposing counsel had characterized the material as "rank hearsay, rumor, unqualified opinion, and totally irrelevant."

In a recent compilation of famous labor cases before the Supreme Court, David Ziskind, of the Department of Labor, writing in the University of Chicago Law Review, June 1939, estimates that in cases where one party used economic data and the other did not, victory went to the former 16 times and to the latter only 3 times. This was something more than a coincidence, he concluded.

"The Supreme Court opinions," he wrote, "bear many grateful acknowledgements of the economic data submitted * * * as long as courts seek the reasonableness of legislation in a changing economic order, as long as laws require an effect upon interstate commerce, or as long as attorneys must prove an intent to accomplish an economic objective, there will remain a need for economic data."

WHERE FIGHT CENTERS

Nevertheless the drive in Congress against the particular economic division of the Labor Board continues. It is directed against a particular personality, that of Dr. David J. Saposs, the N. L. R. B. research head. Largely to oust him, the drive against the whole Economic Division is instituted.

Dr. Saposs came to the Board from the United States Labor Department. He took undergraduate and graduate work at the University of Wisconsin and assisted Prof. John R. Commons there. He has taught at the University of Toledo, at Columbia in extension courses, had an educational connection with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, and taught at the Brookwood Labor College, a left-wing organization. He did research work for the Twentieth Century Fund, and had a fellowship from the Rockefeller Foundation.

While at Geneva, Dr. Saposs reported a meeting of a labor left-wing group. His report of their utterances was interpreted as voicing his own views, and he has been attacked before the Dies committee, by Senator EDWARD R. BURKE (D.), of Nebraska, and more recently by members of the Smith committee. Dr. Saposs has on numerous occasions denied he was a Communist or ever connected with communism. He cites Communist attacks against him. Neverthless it is generally agreed that the fight on the N. L. R. B. research division largely centers round his personality.

STRANGLING THE N. L. R. A.

(By Ernest K. Lindley)

THOSE AMENDMENTS

Many proposals for amending the National Labor Relations Act are before Congress. Some are complex. Some, in the proper mixture, would amount to repeal of the law. But nobody is openly advocating its repeal.

Without waiting for the orderly consideration of proposed amendments, the House Appropriations Subcommittee has apparently decided that the law is not worthy of effective enforcement. It has set out to dispose of it by a combination of strangulation and amputation. It has cut about $330,000, or 10 percent, from the appropriation requested for an agency which for several years has been overworked as few agencies have been overworked since Hugh Johnson was managing the Blue Eagle. In spite of long hours at high pressure, the N. L. R. B. has not yet been able to catch up with the demands on it.

One slash of $57,000 would require dropping about one-fourth of the N. L. R. B.'s trial examiners. At present they number 39, and each of them takes testimony in about 30 cases a year. It is inconceivable that the number of cases heard by each examiner can be increased. If the cut stands, fewer cases will be heard. Although the number of cases brought to the Board shows signs of slacking off, many of the new cases are more complicated, or, to borrow Chairman Madden's word, more "subtle," than those sometimes heard in the earlier days.

Many employers started off on the assumption that the N. L. R. B. was unconstitutional. So they were advised in 1936 by some 58 of the highest-paid lawyers in the country, who obliged the American Liberty League by going on the record on this point. About a year later the Supreme Court—the old court, before a single Roosevelt appointee sat on it—emphatically decided that these lawyers and their clients, actual or prospective, were wrong. In those early days, employers and their lawyers openly challenged the law. They did not resort to the more refined evasions, the detection and determination of which naturally requires the taking of elaborate testimony, and therefore uses up the time of trial examiners.

While, on the whole, the House subcommittee rested on slow strangulation, through reduced appropriations, it resorted in one case to outright amputation. In effect it decided to abolish the use of the N. L. R. B. of the Brandeis brief. The Brandeis brief is one packed with facts, usually economic data. Louis D. Brandeis, retired Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, developed it 30 years or so ago.

The Brandeis brief recognizes that intelligent interpretations of law cannot be made by logic operating in a vacuum. The courts must know not only the bare facts of a case but the economic setting. In many types of cases involving finance, industry, and labor the Brandeis brief has come close to being the standard.

In its profound wisdom, however, a House subcommittee has decided, in effect, to repeal this great legal advance insofar as the N. L. R. B. is concerned by abolishing its economics division. It has cut out $45,900 for the 15 economists employed by this division. Apparently it overlooked $23,700 for the clerks and stenographers who now work for these economists, so that the net effect of this bit of discriminating economy would be to pay the salaries of 14 clerks and stenographers who would have no work to do.

Whether the N. L. R. B. needs 15 economists, or 10, or 5, or 20, I haven't the slightest idea. Chairman Madden of the N. L. R. B. told the subcommittee he did not and could not know exactly how many it needs. He relies on the head of that division, David Saposs, to tell him. He did say that every economist employed was employed only after Mr. Saposs had made a strong case to the Board members.

What is certain is that the N. L. R. B. cannot operate intelligently without the aid of economists. If it does not employ economists, it must employ lawyers who are familiar with economics, or it must rely on another agency for its economic information. Some members of the subcommittee apparently thought it should rely on the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Labor Department. Dr. Lubin, Chief of that Bureau; Chairman Madden, of the N. L. R. B.; and other persons assert that the work of the economics division of the N. L. R. B. does not duplicate that of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Economic facts probably were decisive in the test cases in which the Supreme Court upheld the National Labor Relations Act in 1937. What part of an industry's raw materials was imported across State lines, and what part of its finished products was exported across State lines? These were basic facts in determining whether the industry was engaged in interstate commerce and therefore subject to Federal law. They were economic facts.

In the University of Chicago Law Review of last June, David Ziskind, a senior attorney in the Department of Labor, analyzed the results of the use of economic briefs in labor cases. He found that in 19 cases before Federal circuit courts of appeals, where one side used economic data and the other did not, the side which used them won 16 times, and the side which did not won only 3 times. He found also that when the N. L. R. B. used them it usually won, and that when, for one reason or another, it had neglected the economic side it had lost.

The effect of the proposed cut would be to deprive the N. L. R. B. of economic assistance and leave this powerful weapon to the exclusive use of violators of the law. This is a slash too significant to be explained under the heading of "economy."

EXHIBIT D

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1940.

HON. ABE MURDOCK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MURDOCK: In response to your request for my opinion on the proposal to abolish the division of economic research, I submit the following:

1. The work of the Board would be very seriously handicapped if it were deprived of the services of the Division. The notion that no need exists for a division of economic research seems to me quite erroneous and can only be based on inadequate information of the functions which that division performs in connection with the work of the Labor Relations Board. Shortly after I was appointed to the Board I made a special study of the operations of the division, and I was convinced that the division and the research it carries on are essential to proper functioning of the Board and to efficient performance of the duties imposed on the Board by Congress. I came to this conclusion after questioning practically every member of the tariff of the division, inquiring into the work they were doing, and reading reports they submitted.

2. If I may say so, I think that those who are attempting to kill off the research division are shooting in the wrong direction.

There is need for reorganization of the Administrative Division of the Board, and a staff less heavily weighted with lawyers would be desirable. To provide a better balanced personnel the proportion of men trained or experienced in administration, economics, and in labor relations needs to be increased and the proportion of lawyers decreased. The proposal to eliminate that part of the staff which is trained in economics and labor research, therefore, seems to me particularly unwise at this time.

3. The work of the economic division is not decreasing. Although the number of complaint cases is slowly falling off, the problems involved in the complaints are becoming increasingly complex. Representation cases at the same time are becoming more numerous. Moreover, I do not find any other branch of the Government equipped to supply the Board with the particular type of economic information which the administration of the act requires.

4. The notion that the Board is primarily a prosecuting agency may be responsible for the proposal to eliminate the research division. This is an erroneous notion. The National Labor Relations Act is a remedial and not a penal statute; it empowers the Board only to find facts and to order appropriate remedies. For investigating and fact finding a research division is, of course, essential. For prosecuting it may not be needed. The effect of eliminating the division would be to make the Board more of a prosecuting agency and less an investigating body. This, I think, would be very unfortunate.

5. The proposed drastic cut in the appropriation for trial examiners is likely to have the same effect of emphasizing prosecution rather than careful investigation and fact finding. The need is for better trained trial examiners, and for more thorough and careful preparation of intermediate reports by the trial examiners. Much improvement, in this direction, has been made during the last year. The proposed cut for the trial examiners division will hamper this development, and will be a backward step in the direction of less careful investigation and fact finding.

In accordance with your request I am also enclosing a description of the functions of the division of economic research.

Sincerely yours,

WM. M. LEISERSON.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. WOOD. Is the debate going to be cut off?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the amendment, and I want to know if there is going to be an opportunity to be heard?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I may assure the gentleman there is no disposition on the part of the committee to refuse reasonable opportunity for debate. However, that is a matter within the control of the Committee and not within our control.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER]?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, in asking for 15 minutes there is no intention on the gentleman's part to prevent a full discussion or debate of this matter?

Mr. TARVER. Of course not. I think my friend knows me well enough to appreciate I would not have any such idea, and I could not control it if I wanted to.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman is willing to help us extend the time so that everyone can be heard and not reduce the time to 2 or 3 minutes per Member?

Mr. TARVER. I am very much in favor of reasonable opportunity for debate, but the question of limiting the debate is with the Committee, not with me; that is, with the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOOD. But the gentleman makes the suggestion sometimes that debate be limited.

Mr. TARVER. It is absolutely necessary to do that sometimes, as the gentleman knows.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] that he may be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall consume 15 minutes. I simply do not want to have to make a hurried statement regarding the matters that I desire to discuss.

I had hoped that this question might be determined with out anybody being accused of trying to destroy any instrumentality of the Government, on the one hand, or being accused, on the other hand, of being in favor of the oppression of industry. Surely men of the caliber of those who compose the membership of this House are capable of discussing a question of this sort as Americans, interested not only in labor but in employers, and in the welfare of the people as a whole. I am a friend of labor. I think every workingman in my district knows that to be true. I am also not ashamed to make the statement that I am a friend of employers, and I think it is absolutely necessary for the interest of labor that reasonable protection be accorded those furnishing employment in industry in this country. However, your subcommittee in undertaking to fix the amount of this appropriation had no thought in the world of endeavoring to influence the question of whether the National Labor Relations Act should be amended or repealed, or what legislative action should be taken with regard to it. Our only purpose was to try to fix what in our judgment would constitute a reasonable appropriation for carrying on this activity for the next fiscal year.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who believe that the National Labor Relations Board is either a panacea for all the troubles of labor or that it is an ogre with horns and a tail undertaking to oppress industry. Surely there is a medium between these extremes. Surely a man in the discharge of his obligations as a Member of Congress may conscientiously stand upon the floor of this House and advocate a medium course without being charged with the purpose to violate the rules of the House by legislating on a matter of this sort, and without being charged with undertaking to destroy an instrumentality of the Government, and, on the other hand, if he takes the contrary position to the one which I am assuming, he should not be charged with being a radical or interested in trying to put oppressive burdens upon industry. Permit me to say that the information to which the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK] referred as having come from me was information which I gave him in order to correct a mistaken impression under which he was laboring. He thought that our subcommittee had undertaken to cut out the Division of Economic Research because of Dr. Saposs, when no such thought was ever advanced by any member of the subcommittee. I know nothing about Dr. Saposs. Of course, I have read something since the committee took action and I heard the speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] on the floor the other day, but I do not conceive it to be the duty of a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee to raise or lower appropriations in accordance with whether or not they like the type of man who happens to be at the head of a particular division or bureau.

That is not our concern. We have no appointing authority and we have no authority to remove employees. If this is a necessary activity under the authority of the National Labor Relations Board it ought to be carried on. If it is authorized by law and if it is not a duplication of other activities of the Government, and if an improper person is at the head of the Board—and I express no opinion regarding that one way or the other, because, as I say, it was not discussed by our subcommittee—then it is to be assumed that in some way a proper person will be placed in charge of the activities.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I am sorry I cannot yield now. I hope to be able to do so later.

The gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK] admitted that there is no express authority in the National Labor Relations Act for the setting up of a Division of Economic Research under the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. He says there is implied authority to that effect. Of course, that is a matter about which there would naturally be among lawyers a difference of opinion, but there is one thing about which I do not believe you can differ with me and that is that any work which is being done by this Economic Research Division is necessarily a duplication of work that is authorized by law in express terms and that is being conducted under the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor.

Let us see if that is true. I have already called attention to the fact that the National Labor Relations Act gives this Board no express authority to set up such a division, and the gentleman from Utah admits that. What authority does the statute law give to the Bureau of Labor Statistics? I read from section 1 of chapter I of title XXIX of the United States Code defining the jurisdiction of that Bureau.

The general design and duties of the Bureau of Labor Statistics shall be to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with labor, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and especially upon its relation to capital, the hours of labor, the earnings of laboring men and women, and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity.

Can there be any broader authority? Can there be any more express authority than that which I have just read for the carrying on of investigations of this sort within the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Labor Statistics? And does it not necessarily follow that investigations which are being carried on under the National Labor Relations Board not expressly authorized by law are necessarily a duplication of the operations of the Bureau of Labor Statistics?

How many economic analysts—and you understand, of course, that this division is composed of economic analysts 14 in number, with certain clerical assistants—are employed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics? There are 75 economic analysts being paid large salaries by the Government, with one legal research assistant, now engaged under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in studying problems of the character outlined in this section of the code which I have just read in your hearing.

With that the fact, and it must be the admitted fact, is there anyone who will say that we ought to permit the setting up under another authority of the Government without any express provision of legislation to that effect of an organization which is substantially undertaking to duplicate work already being done?

This committee is not only impressed with the work of the Bureau of Labor Statistics and has not only dealt sympathetically with that Bureau but in this bill has added to the appropriation of the Bureau of Labor Statistics above the Budget the amount of $25,000. A disposition to hurt labor? Why, every provision of the bill negatives any such insistence.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I should be pleased to yield to the gentleman, although I have another subject matter to which I wish to make brief reference.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does not the gentleman concede that the Economics Division of the National Labor Relations Board is necessary in connection with the presentation of cases to courts where violations of the Labor Act are involved? Does not the gentleman concede that going to the Bureau of Labor Statistics is burdensome and lacks the correlation which is necessary to prepare efficiently a case in which the question of interstate commerce is involved?

Mr. TARVER. Of course, I do not concede that. On the contrary, I conceive that in construing the law reasonable persons must believe that it was the intention of Congress that all information of this character should be secured from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, because Congress expressly provided that the Bureau of Labor Statistics should do this work and it did not expressly provide that the National Labor Relations Board should do it. No gentleman is able to point out anything in the language of the Wagner Labor Relations Act which expressly authorizes such an activity.

The matter to which I have just referred affects only $45,000 of this reduction. Fifty-five thousand dollars of the decrease is occasioned by this fact: It developed in the hearings that for the present fiscal year the Board had $55,000 more than they needed for salary purposes and they transferred that amount to the printing and binding item. We felt that if they are able for this fiscal year to get along on $55,000 less than had been provided for them they ought to be able to take a similar reduction for the next fiscal year.

With regard to the volume of business before the Board, in the fiscal year 1938 there were in excess of 10,000 cases brought to their attention, in 1939 approximately 7,000 cases, a reduction of over 3,000 cases, and for the first 6 months of this fiscal year there were 3,085 cases only brought to their attention, thus showing that there is a steady diminution in the work which is being brought to the attention of the Board.

It is not true, in your opinion, that in view of this diminution in the labor of the Board there should be some small reduction in the amount of appropriations made available for the payment of their personnel?

Let me say this to you. This is supposed to be an effort made on the part of these gentlemen on behalf of the laboring men of this country. It is going to do these economic analysts, if it is successful, a lot more good than it will do the laboring people. This is a question of providing thousands of dollars more in order to pay high-salaried professors and economic analysts and other employees of that type in the Washington office of the National Labor Relations Board. This is an amendment for the relief of economic analysts. This is not an amendment for the relief of the working people of the United States, and the interests of no laboring man in this country will be adversely affected by the action which the subcommittee has proposed.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. On the question of figures as to the pending work, I think the gentleman has stated the figures correctly as they appear in the record, but I call your attention to the fact that on June 30, 1938, there were pending before the Board 3,778 cases, and on June 30, 1939, 4,103 cases. I think this is the most pertinent data in the report as to the bulk of the work now remaining to be disposed of by the Board.

Mr. TARVER. That does not necessarily mean that the Board has not had sufficient personnel with which to function. In my opinion it does not mean that; it means that with the personnel they have had, they have not undertaken to decide those cases.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], for whom I have a great deal of personal respect, suggested that we were facing here a question of the policy of the Appropriations Committee in using its power in recommending appropriations to effect legislation. As I have always understood it, the purpose of the Appropriations Committee is to make an examination of the justifications presented to it and to determine whether or not the appropriations were being used to carry out the purposes of law as intended by the Congress, and also to determine the proper balance of appropriations with the funds that might be available.

It seems to me in this particular instance this subcommittee has performed a very definite service for the Congress. As has already been intimated in the expressions by the gentleman who just preceded me, the chairman of the subcommittee, the original intent of the law made it clear that it was intended that the Labor Department should furnish statistical information for the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I cannot yield, as I have only a few minutes, and I have some material I want the gentleman to get, because I am afraid that he would not read it.

Dr. Lubin, of the Labor Department, is on record as testifying that he was ready to provide this information for the Labor Board, and yet here we have the record that the National Labor Relations Board created the position of consultant and chief industrial economist and employed one David Saposs as that person.

I want to give you a little of the record from the hearings before the Smith committee as published in their report of February 14 to identify this man Saposs. In one exhibit, exhibit No. 911, it is found that Saposs was one of the directors of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action, an organization formed, according to the preamble to their constitution—

To band militant workers together to take control of industry and government.

Let me quote the closing paragraph of the preamble:

The C. P. L. A. has therefore been formed in the United States of America, the very stronghold of capitalism and imperialism, to band militant workers together. It is an organization of militants * * * which seeks in every way and on every front to unify and build up the power of labor, so that the workers may take over control of industry and Government, abolish the system which makes cannon fodder out of them in time of war and machine fodder in time of peace, and build a sane and just economic system and a workers' republic, to be united in bonds of comradeship with workers' republics throughout the world.

Mr. Chairman, those were the beguiling words that marked the invitation to communism in Russia. They run all through the preamble of this constitution of the C. P. L. A., of which Saposs was a director. The opening paragraph reads:

Planless, profiteering, war-provoking, imperialistic capitalism must be abolished. It cannot be reformed. Sham political democracy which has been the tool of capitalist business and finance must also go.

You members of the Democratic Party who say you seek to preserve democracy, I would like to have you get the import of that. I quote further:

The job of abolishing capitalism and building a new social order must be done by the workers, industrial, agricultural, clerical, technical, professional, who stand to gain, materially and spiritually, by the change. We, the workers, must ourselves provide the revolutionary will, the courage, and the intelligence for the task.

To realize our aims, we must achieve power. To gain power, we must organize.

There you have the philosophy of the destruction of the private capitalistic system which many people see in the policies of the N. L. R. B., for whom Saposs is the consultant and chief economist.

Let me now read from an article cited in this same hearing and identified as an article on the Role of the Middle Class, written by David Saposs, and published in 1935. Here, then, is the chief consultant of the N. L. R. B. speaking:

The genuine populist element must recognize that their original idea of small-scale industry and self-employment is unattainable. * * *

They must openly acknowledge that collectivism and socialization is the only way out.

Here is the man who is consultant to the National Labor Relations Board, who states that the workers must realize that socialization is the only way out and whose call to action, as expressed in this article, clearly shows the source of policies expressed in the administration of the National Labor Relations Act. Let me give you another sentence or two from this man who visions the job of the middle class:

They must hit squarely at the private ownership of big business. Social control is only feasible as a first step, and one which must be cautiously applied. The only solution is the socialization of the substance of power which rests in the private ownership of the essential means of production and distribution.

Is there any hope for labor in that philosophy? Only the dead end of regimentation and enslavement. Socialization and collectivism as we have seen them demonstrated in the world today are not the goals of men who want to be free.

Let me give you another sentence from Saposs:

Indeed, these three—a socialization program, separate political organization, and the building of a collectivist culture—must be featured and introduced simultaneously.

That is the creed, that is the goal of the man who does the research for N. L. R. B. He is the man who is the official consultant for the members of the National Labor Relations Board. He is the chief economist; consultant and chief economist. That is his official title. An economist who does not believe in the American economic system. A director of research who is a propagandist. A consultant who advises the middle class and the workers to develop a revolutionary will and to establish a collective system. The National Labor Relations Board is supposed to be a quasi-judicial board, one could say a full judicial board, free to protect the wishes of labor in selecting an organization of its own choosing. Such an attitude can be preserved only when there is no bias on the part of the Board or its advisers. But let me give you this final word from Saposs, in answer to a direct question in the Smith hearings:

Question. Is it not a fact, Mr. Saposs, that you for a long time have been in favor of the industrial type of union?

Answer. I have written indicating that the industrial type of union for mass-production industries was bound to be the most adaptable type, and I have also written and indicated that I doubted whether mass-production industries could be organized except through the industrial type of union.

So, if you want to understand the bias that has actuated the policies and administration of the National Labor Relations Board, you can find one source of it in these expressions of the man who is consultant of the Labor Relations Board for whose work the committee reduced the amount requested by the President. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah, an amendment to restore money for the consultant and chief economist, will be voted down.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I shall not at this time, of course, undertake any extended discussion of the National Labor Relations Board. I shall reserve that attempt until we take up the consideration of the Smith amendments in the Walter bill, which I feel I am in a position to assure you will be soon.

In governmental matters the use of the purse string to correct evils which cannot otherwise be reached is always justifiable.

The Labor Board was set up as an administrative agency, but has functioned as a legislative body, engaging in every conceivable excess and abuse of the discretion which Members were intended to exercise.

Knowing better what you intended when you adopted the measure bringing the Board into existence, it has proceeded to make law and to substitute its judgment for that of the Congress.

The Board was brought into existence to serve as the agent of the Congress in the enforcement of congressional will, but it has become a Frankenstein to turn upon you and make you regret the birth of this hideous monster of your brain.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. No.

Rather than perform as a democratic institution it has behaved as if it were the agents of Moscow. When you seek to correct any error that you may have committed in the adoption of the law or to correct bad practices on the part of the Board, members come up to the Hill and stop you in your tracks through the technique of staging a sit-down strike on the part of one of your committees.

By eliminating the appropriation for a division of economic research the committee handling this bill has opened the door for the exit of Mr. Saposs, a Russian naturalized in 1935, but it has left on the inside a group of others with the same kind of teeth and the same kind of appetite.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I am sorry; no.

Edwin Smith is worse than Saposs, and Madden is not much better. I shall not undertake to classify Nathan Witt, who handles Smith and Madden as if they were his own private jumping jacks.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I am sorry; no.

If Congress did not intend to authorize the excesses of the Board, their total disregard of what is right and just, then it should use whatever means that are fair to bring the Board within the limit of congressional intent.

The Board exercises greater power under its interpretation of administrative law than is exercised by the Supreme Court under the Constitution.

Through the exercise of their discretion the Board reviews and modifies your legislative acts—something that the Supreme Court cannot do. It exerts a power which you have no constitutional right to grant. It is a fourth department of the Government, for which there is no constitutional authority.

The Board assumes to determine the legislative policy of the Congress. It substitutes personal government for government by law, a retrogression to the totalitarianism of monarchy. Freed of the restraint of judicial review, the Board has gone wild and has brought the whole philosophy of administrative law into disrepute and has done incalculable injury to every other administrative agency in the Government.

The power to legislate belongs to the Congress and this power it cannot delegate. It, of course, may declare its will and after fixing primary standards empower administrative officers to fill up details, but when such administrative officers go without the limits of the standards fixed by Congress they become legislators. Congress did not give to the Board the power to determine what the law should be but delegated only the right of discretion as to the execution of the law. The Board has greatly subverted and modified the terms of the act under which it was brought into existence.

The amendment should be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute further.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New Jersey objects.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ENGEL. I object.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will that give the gentleman opportunity to yield to questions?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] has objected.

Mr. WOOD. I have not consumed very much time of this House, but if that is the attitude to be assumed, I shall see that nobody else has an extension of time.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I would like to have the gentleman from Missouri have his time, but when the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], after we had given the proponents of the amendment, the author of the amendment, 15 minutes without objection, objects to one additional minute for the gentleman from Georgia, I feel constrained to object to any further requests for additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I shall withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, my genial friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] referred to a sit-down strike engaged in by some Members of Congress, and I assume that he is referring to the Labor Committee, to a sit-down strike on the consideration of the proposed amendments to the National Labor Relations Act. I think that comes with ill grace from a man like the gentleman from Georgia, a member of the Committee on Rules, when, under his leadership the Rules Committee engaged in a sit-down strike on the Wage and Hour Act for nearly 2 years—and he did an able job of it.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment strikes at the very vitals of this magna carta of labor, the Wagner Labor Relations Act, and the Appropriations Committee has offered only one or two reasons for their reduction of the appropriation below the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget. Their first reason is that in 1938, the fiscal year, there were 10,430 cases and in 1939, 6,904 cases, and during the first 6 months of the current year, 3,085 cases. The fact of the matter is that when the law went into effect the Board got cases from labor organizations, and they got cases from employers, and many of those cases were for the purpose of defining the jurisdiction of the law. Many of those cases sent to the Board at first could be answered the same day. They were merely an interpretation and that accounted for so many more cases being received by the Board in the first year. But it should be remembered that the number of cases has nothing whatever to do with the work of this Board.

The Wierton Steel Co. case consumed more time than possibly 60 or 70 other smaller cases. So the number of cases has nothing to do with the work being performed by the personnel of the National Labor Relations Board.

On February 1, 3,566 cases were in the process of adjudication. Added to that were 3,085 cases received the first 6 months of 1938. So to reduce the appropriation below the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget means nothing else than to partially emasculate the law.

The committee suggested that the division of economic research would be eliminated. I am not going to discuss that matter with the committee because when the committee intimates that the division of economic research probably should be abolished, it convinces me that they have made no study of it. Dr. Lubin himself told the committee that he could not perform that service. So if you are going to take out that $45,000 appropriation, you will hamstring the proper administration of this act. Of all measures that should not be hamstrung is the administration of this act. Whatever may be the personnel of this Board, or the field examiners, or the field personnel, it can be changed.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. Even if the recommendation of the committee is sustained, there is absolutely nothing that would require the Board to do away with this division of economic research. It is not an act of Congress; it is merely a suggestion of a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WOOD. The committee suggests it themselves. The committee realizes that if this appropriation is reduced it will be eliminated.

Mr. COCHRAN. It probably does, but the suggestion in the report surely is not mandatory upon the Board to destroy this unit.

Mr. WOOD. No; it is not mandatory, but that shows the trend of their mind. That shows what they are thinking about. They seek to destroy this law through reducing the appropriation when it could be done in the regular method, if at all.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I wonder if they intended it to have the effect of destroying that section, why did they say, "And it is expected that this section will be absolutely eliminated."

Mr. WOOD. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman has mentioned personnel. I cannot allow to go unchallenged the words of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] against the chairman of the Board, Mr. Madden. I have known him for many years. He is a splendid attorney, a devoted public servant, and has well done a difficult job. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. In addition to that, the Board has won almost every case that has been appealed to the Supreme Court.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As a matter of fact, this Board has the best Supreme Court record of any agency of the Government.

Mr. WOOD. There is no question about that.

Now, many assertions have been made by Members on this floor, "I am friendly to labor." If you are, then of all measures you should not try to hamper the administration of this act, which strikes at the very vitals of the future happiness of the wage earners of this Nation. It protects them in their right of collective bargaining, and we should give the Board ample appropriation, whoever may be the personnel, although the personnel can be changed. Our Labor Committee has agreed to increase the personnel of the Board from three to five members.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] said that this Board had gone outside its jurisdiction on various occasions. Out of 105 cases that went to the court, in just 1 did it go outside of its jurisdiction.

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the only mistake the Board has made that I know of is showing partiality between the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. That has gotten them into nearly all of their trouble.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. If we are going to make any change in the fundamental law, should it not come through the legislative committee rather than to be done through the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. WOOD. Yes. It should be done in the regular and orderly manner.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. MAY. It seems that the argument is that this appropriation is principally needed for the purpose of the economic research division and that the Department of Labor is to furnish the statistics for that purpose. What have they done with the appropriation for the Labor Department in that regard?

Mr. WOOD. The Department of Labor has neither the facilities nor the personnel to take care of this. Why go to the Department of Labor when the National Labor Relations Board is compelled to go to those points immediately when a case comes before the Board, and why should they not make that investigation themselves? Then they can go to the Department of Labor for any information they cannot get.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. MAY. It has been stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] that amendments will come up for consideration with the Labor Relations Board. Why refuse to give the appropriation if we are going to have an opportunity to amend the legislation?

Mr. WOOD. That is correct. I hope that this amendment will pass. I have never intimated that any Member of this House was not a friend of labor, but I say to you that whoever votes to reduce this appropriation hampers the administration of this law and is not performing a favorable act for labor, either organized or unorganized.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. A moment ago the gentleman said the board had gotten into trouble because of their partiality toward the C. I. O. as against the A. F. of L. If the gentleman would follow this statement by Saposs he would know why they have shown favoritism to one side as against the other.

Mr. WOOD. We all know there are accusations on both sides. They have been accused of leaning toward one side or the other and this has done more harm to them than anything else.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say that I believe the Board has done an excellent job.

Mr. WOOD. As a whole they have, especially Mr. Madden. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we cannot reach an agreement as to time for debate on this matter. Ten gentlemen have indicated a desire to speak on this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 50 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE] for 5 minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we have always had trouble between capital and labor. It would be difficult to compute the loss to the American people resulting from this struggle. It has been interesting to watch the progress of labor step by step in achieving its present independence, recognition, and improved labor conditions.

The thing we must consider at this time is whether we need a Labor Relations Board, and if we need it then we should give it sufficient appropriations with which to do the job it has been assigned. In considering whether we need a Labor Relations Board let us review history, let us turn back to the days when the welfare of the Nation hung in the balance, to the days of Teddy Roosevelt, when the eyes of the entire Nation were turned on him in his effort to settle the great coal strike, when people were shivering around fuelless stoves and factories were threatened with idleness for the want of fuel.

Let us then turn to the activities of President Wilson in his efforts to settle the great railroad strike when the fundamental principle of the 8-hour day was up for final solution. Had either one of those great men failed in their efforts to settle those strikes, the country would have suffered a great set-back, accompanied by misery and terrible conditions.

In adjusting this struggle between capital and labor it is my contention and my idea that the Labor Relations Board is one of the most important organizations of government charged with a great responsibility. The security of our people depends upon the success of the Labor Relations Board in investigating conditions and making fair decisions: according to labor what labor is entitled to, and according to capital what capital is entitled to. For this reason, as part of a constructive plan, I am entirely in support of this amendment, and I urge the Members of this House to make the necessary appropriation to carry on this great work of the National Labor Relations Board. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON] for 5 minutes.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have just as much interest in and sympathy for the welfare of labor as any Member of this House. I voted for the creation of the National Labor Relations Board and voted against the appropriation for its investigation by a special committee of the House. I do not believe there is a Member of the House who is honest and sincere in his belief that labor should have the right to bargain collectively who would vote to repeal this act directly or indirectly, or try to hamper the work of the Board.

I believe most of the criticism that has been directed toward the National Labor Relations Board has been developed and leveled toward the personnel, or some of the personnel of the staff, and possibly against the administration of the act rather than the act itself.

After careful consideration the subcommittee handling this item thought a reduction could be made in the appropriation for 1941 without impairing the work of the Board; that even with the cut they could still carry out the intent of Congress. It has been pointed out here several times today that there has been a reduction in the number of cases coming before the Board. This is true, and it might have some bearing on the reduction of the personnel. I will not go over the number of cases that have been handled by the Board, because that has been covered, but I want to point the situation out briefly. Six field examiners were eliminated because we thought they were unnecessary. The clerical staff was reduced, and we eliminated the item in relation to the economic research bureau because they are synonymous with one another. Under field attorneys we eliminated 14. This still leaves them with 70. In the trial examining division we eliminated 12, but they still have 30. The division of economic research we eliminated, because although Dr. Lubin did not testify that he could not do this work, I think he testified that he was not doing this work. We think his Bureau can do the work.

I am not going into the matter of whether Dr. Saposs is competent or incompetent, whether he is a Communist, an American, or what not.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. It is a fact, though, that practically every governmental department has a division of economics.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think that is true.

Mr. HEALEY. And is it not also true that practically every large industrial concern in the country has a division of economics?

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. HEALEY. Can the gentleman tell me in all fairness why this particular administration should be crippled and not be provided with sufficient funds to maintain a division of economics?

Mr. HOUSTON. Only this, we thought the Bureau of Labor Statistics could do the work.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Then if the Bureau of Labor Statistics can do the work for this particular agency, why is not the same applicable to all the other agencies that have economic divisions?

Mr. HOUSTON. That probably is true. But at the same time, this is the only Bureau dealing with labor that has a research division outside of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Then the Appropriations Committee should withhold funds from the economic divisions of all the agencies. Why single out the economic division of the N. L. R. B.?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is going far afield. We think the Bureau of Labor Statistics can handle this work. Maybe we are incorrect. I am not so sure about it myself. I do know that the chairman of the economic research bureau gets a salary of $6,500 a year. There is one economist immediately under him who receives $4,600 a year. There is one associate industrial economist who gets $3,800. There are three receiving $3,200, five getting $2,600, and four getting $2,000 each. We think they have grown a little too large in that Bureau and we believe that the Bureau of Labor Statistics can do the work, and at less cost. I may be wrong about that, I do not know, but that is what we think.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS F. FORD].

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I am going to address my remarks largely to what I consider to be the National Labor Relations Board's magnificent record in handling one of the most complicated problems that ever faced a body of men in the history of this country.

The National Labor Relations Board was called upon to stand in between two big labor unions and the employers. It was natural that every decision it made would not conform to the views of one or two of those three factors. Their decisions would be criticized if they were men possessed of the patience of Job, the wisdom of Solomon, and the tolerance of Lincoln. But if you will take the record over the 3 or 4 years it has been functioning, if you will consider the effect that the Board has had upon labor relations in the United States, I do not think any fair-minded Member of this House can justify the proposition that the Board ought to be hampered by depriving it of the services of so vital a facility as its economic division. The Board has been charged with everything short of arson, murder, and sudden death. It has been said that it has violated all the rules of fairness and all the laws of Congress and that it has gone beyond its jurisdiction. In regard to this unwarranted charge I want to assert that out of 105 cases taken to the courts of the United States, where the question of jurisdiction was involved, the courts have only held in one single instance that it had gone beyond its jurisdiction.

I would like to call attention to another point. The Board has had 25 cases before the Supreme Court of the United States, and 21 of those cases were sustained in their entirety, 2 were sustained in part, and 2 were set aside. If there is any other quasi-judicial body functioning in the United States with a better record than that, trot it out.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Is it not the gentleman's understanding that this research bureau in the Labor Relations Board has been one of the main agencies that has assisted the Board in the preparation of its work and therefore would be responsible for having helped keep the Board within the proper limits of its work?

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. I thank the gentleman. His statement is absolutely correct. As a matter of fact, when the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Act was before the Supreme Court of the United States it was the brief which Mr. Saposs prepared and which the Board's attorneys submitted to the Court that enabled the Court to sustain the Board in its position.

Mr. GEYER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. GEYER of California. Does the gentleman know of any more effective way to cripple an institution than to cut out its funds?

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Yes; I know of a better way; that is, cutting off one of the principal facilities for securing the necessary information to function within the law, and whether the subcommittee intends it or not, that will be the effect of this particular denial of funds. For that reason I am supporting the Murdock amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK].

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the gentleman from Georgia when he gave as one of his reasons why this amendment should be defeated, the private-life record of Mr. Saposs. I am not acquainted with the record of Mr. Saposs either in his private or public life other than in his official duties. I am acquainted with the record that he made in connection with his brief filed in the United States Supreme Court in that famous labor case, which is one of the outstanding monuments in the history of labor jurisprudence. If the gentleman from Georgia wishes to be consistent or logical in his reasons for attempting to stop appropriations because of the personal background of one of its employees, the gentleman should remain consistent and be at least logical, because my memory is very vivid concerning the gentleman's vote that was cast in the affirmative for the continuation of a certain investigating committee, the chief investigator of which was at one time a speaker on the same platform and delivered an address on the same platform with Earl Browder—No. 1 Communist in this Nation. He even went to Russia in the interest of communism. This great Communist is in my opinion the most dangerous man in this Nation in the position he now holds as chief investigator of the investigating committee. He is now on the pay roll of that committee at $7,200 per year. Let the gentleman from Georgia inform the people of this Nation that the committee on un-American activities now have this person on their pay roll directing the policy of that committee.

When it comes to the proposition of whether or not the National Labor Relations Board is to function properly, we should not be swayed by the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, because talking about a Frankenstein, I feel there has developed in this Congress through the actions of certain men who are in control of certain committees a Frankenstein that is stifling the rights of labor in this Congress. We are assured by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] that amendments to the Wagner Act, known as the so-called Smith amendments, will be brought before this House very shortly, in opposition and over the head of the Labor Committee. The Labor Committee was constituted and legally constituted to study those questions and present them to the House not the Smith committee. The function of the Smith committee was to investigate and inform the Labor Committee of their findings, and then the Labor Committee should use its own judgment as to what action should be taken. Is the gentleman threatening that the great Rules Committee will again try to crush a standing committee of this House? If he makes such threat, then I say to him that the greatest Frankenstein that we have in this House will have developed and in my opinion has developed from the actions of the Rules Committee. Let us not take away the rights of the other committees just because there may be placed in the hands of the Rules Committee, according to the technicalities of our rules, the right to do it. If that right is in the Rules Committee, then I charge it is the duty of this House to protect the rights of the standing committees by taking away from the Rules Committee the right to crush other committees.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to present to this body in a very short statement the old prejudice against labor by the nobility who controlled, directed, and enslaved labor in the old days. I want to call attention to the universal opposition of the industrial leaders to the laws favoring labor, following that old prejudice, because I am speaking historically correctly. I want, then, to call the attention of the House to the fact that following this same prejudice against labor this House appointed what is known as the Smith committee to investigate especially the N. L. R. B.

Then I wish to state to you that upon the passage of the National Labor Relations Act 58 varieties of lawyers, acting for the Liberty League, for nearly 21 months held up the enforcement of that law and created a condition in this country that was a disgrace to the legal profession. Those men amounted to conspirators against the law and ought to have been punished for their crime. They brought forth prejudices and hatreds that ought not to have been permitted here; and, being themselves lawyers, they knew ahead of time what would be the effect of their shameless conspiracy in that matter.

The Appropriations Committee, as a committee, has absolutely no right to suggest a change in a law, as they did in this case in their report on this bill. Individually they had every right that I have or that any other Member on the floor of this House has, but acting as a committee and suggesting as they do very clearly that they are looking for and demanding a change in the law, they are not justified at all as a committee. They ought not to have done this, and I trust we will not have that sort of a mistake to contend with again.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] says the consideration of Mr. Saposs had nothing at all to do with the suggestion of the cutting out of this appropriation, but the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] devoted 5 minutes to showing that that was exactly the reason it was done. I do not know who is right or who is wrong in this matter, but I do know that the talk along that line has been too long indulged in not to have a good deal of foundation in fact. I am sure that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] personally had no such feeling, but that that feeling did exist somewhere in the committee there is little if any doubt.

Involving this whole matter of the usefulness and justification of the economists in this Government agency, I am preparing an address on Dr. Saposs and Judge Smith, and hope to deliver it before this body in the very near future. I shall pull no punch when I deliver this address. I shall tell the full truth, with the implications that necessarily follow statements of fact. Then we will find out, I believe, whether or not this body, the N. L. R. B., has use for economists.

To expect or demand that the Department of Labor should be asked to furnish economists for this special Board is nonsense on its face. You ought not to do it, gentlemen, because it is not at all justified in reason. The National Labor Relations Board above all others has not only a right but a necessity for having the very best men obtainable along economic lines.

I am going to take up, I repeat to you, the very subject that has been hinted at so much here, and I am going to tell you the full truth. I am going to compare the records of the two men, the one who is criticizing the other, and the one who is acting as economist for the N. L. R. B. When I do, I repeat, I shall pull no punch. In my judgment, a very large proportion of the Members of this House have all too little understanding of the important service which this Government receives from the economists who serve it. In my address on Saposs and Smith I am going to contrast the service rendered by the economists of our own country and several other countries as compared with the politicians who know nothing about economics as applied to government. I shall cite historic instances showing what disaster has resulted from the ignorance of lawmakers who themselves had no knowledge of economics and too much bound by traditions and prejudice to seek or accept the assistance of economists who did and do know. Too often they seem oblivious even to the existence of any facts which should affect the policies of government. The politician who knows nothing of economics and who is unwilling to seek information from men who do know, ought not to pose as a lawmaker, much less to criticize the work of economists.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Murdock amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I believe we should be honest with ourselves and should stop fooling the people about this elimination of the appropriation for the economic division of the National Labor Relations Board. The excuses that have been advanced really fool nobody, but I am not charging, of course, that they were advanced for the purpose of fooling anybody. That would not be parliamentary. As a matter of fact, they do not in any manner close the eyes of the American people to the real purpose behind the amputation of this vital arm of the National Labor Relations Board.

One of the excuses that has been advanced is that it is, after all, a reduction of only $45,000, and that it being a small amount, the National Labor Relations Board can stand it. That was said by one gentleman in favor of this amputation. Another gentleman in favor of the amputation advanced the excuse that we must save money. On the one hand, we have the statement that it is only $45,000 and that the sum is too small to hurt the National Labor Relations Board, and, on the other hand, we are told that the amputation is necessary in order to save money. No matter what the alibi, the committee must admit that it has performed an amputation.

Then we are given the excuse that there is no authority in law for the existence of the economics division of the National Labor Relations Board. Anyone who reads that act will realize there is just as much authority by implication in the national labor relations law for the existence of this division as there is for the hiring of stenographers and other clerical help by the Board. If any particular division of any agency is an integral part of the administration of any law and incidental to the enforcement of that law, the agency charged with the administration of that law has the authority implied in law to establish that division. This is well established law and good government practice, and I challenge contradiction on this point.

The real facts are well known, particularly to the opponents of the law. The real facts are well known particularly to those who want to destroy the National Labor Relations Act. Every lawyer who represents violators of this law is now cheering over the amputation of the economic division from the N. L. R. B. By the elimination of the division of economic research you are cutting off the most important arm in the enforcement of this act. Every one who has had any litigation involving this law knows it. When a case, which has been before this Board has to be taken to court, a brief must be prepared. In the preparation of a brief in a labor case it is absolutely essential that the economic factors must be put into the brief and set forth thoroughly, particularly where the question of interstate commerce is involved. You cannot expect to win any case involving any question of interstate commerce, and you do not have to be a Supreme Court lawyer to know it, unless you put into your brief the economic factors and the entire economic background with regard to the interstate feature of the controversy. So what are we doing? By this amputation of the economics division you deprive the N. L. R. B. of the means by which its economic side of the case can be presented. You take away from the Board this very necessary weapon. This very important element in the enforcement of the law is being taken away from the Government, while on the side of the labor-law violators, while on the side of the manufacturer who decides to challenge this law in court, you have not only an economic division but you have an army of the best economic experts that money can buy.

No economic facts on the side of the National Labor Relations Board, but plenty of economic facts that can be mustered by the best-paid economic experts on the side of those who will violate this law. Hence, the issue is not one of economy. The issue is not one of authority in law. The only issue is whether or not you want the National Labor Relations Board to win its cases in behalf of American workers. When you cut off the economics division, you do so because you want labor to lose in the courts and no matter what the alibis may be this conclusion is inescapable. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY].

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, as the most of you know, I have been serving on the committee appointed to investigate the National Labor Relations Board. We have spent some months conducting hearings and have had a tremendous amount of testimony bearing on the administration of this act by the Board and its personnel. The committee has seen fit by a vote of the majority to make certain recommendations to the Congress at this time for changes in the act. With my colleague, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], I have dissented from those recommendations and we are now preparing a minority report which will be submitted to the House and also, I am informed, the members of the majority of the committee are preparing a report which will be submitted to the House for its consideration. Both of these reports will reflect the views of the men who have sat for many, many hours receiving this testimony. These reports will be the result of our considered deliberations, and before any action of this sort is taken by the House, which means the elimination of an important adjunct of this particular Board, in fairness, I appeal to the Members of the House to wait so that you may have time to study these reports and have time to reflect on whether or not it should be your considered action to eliminate this particular branch of this administration. If, in your sound judgment, you consider that it ought to be eliminated, certainly, you ought to have all the facts presented and you ought to have more grounds for doing so than you have at this particular time. I think you owe this to the country. I think you owe this to the thousands of working people in this country who are affected by this act.

I believe the N. L. R. B. should have an economic division. Practically every other departmental bureau has an economic division. All of the large business houses and industrial concerns maintain an economic division today. In this particular field statistics and economics are most vital and important. Certainly, before we cripple this organization, we ought to have a sound reason for so doing. I appeal to you, therefore, to restore sufficient funds to this agency to enable it to maintain an economic division so necessary to the proper discharge of its functions. When you have the benefit of the committee majority and minority views, I submit you will be better informed. You will then be in a position to give this important matter the calm and deliberate consideration it merits.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have just 3 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has been fixed by action of the Committee.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor, a very conservative newspaper, which states the necessity and the reason for the maintenance of an economics division.

The CHAIRMAN. As the gentleman knows, that permission must be secured in the House.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK].

I believe that the reduction in the appropriation has been made to embarrass the administration of the national labor relations law, and if I had any doubt about this, my doubt would have been cleared today when I heard the speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox]. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] has taken time out on several occasions to chastize the Labor Committee of the House, and particularly has he referred to a sit-down strike of the Labor Committee of the House. I think the gentleman must have a very short memory or he would recall when the sit-down strike was one of his own making in refusing to grant a rule for consideration of a bill the Labor Committee had reported almost unanimously. We waited for more than 1 long year to get that bill before the Members of the House, and then had to resort to a petition which, by the way, was signed in 2 hours and 20 minutes—something that had never been done before—which certainly proved it was the will of the House; but that was the method we had to resort to in order to bring his sit-down strike to an end and bring the bill before the House.

I am tired of listening to criticisms of the Labor Committee, both on the wage and hour amendments and also on the national labor relations amendments. The Labor Committee reported a bill to take care of the inequalities in the wage and hour law more than a year ago, and you know the history of that bill and what happened to it in the Rules Committee. I may say further that we had been sitting patiently hearing evidence in the Labor Committee of any person who wished to appear for or against the National Labor Relations Act for many months when the matter was taken out of our hands. We were not doing the job, apparently, to suit certain gentlemen who never have to account to labor for votes because the laborers in their districts are not allowed the privilege of voting. [Applause.] When I consider that in the district of the gentleman from Georgia he has as many constituents as I have in my district and that my majority, with a very good Republican opponent, was more than 72,000 votes, while the gentleman from Georgia, with no opposition in his election, received the magnificent amount of less than 6,000 votes to bring him here as a Member of this House, I want to know by what authority he speaks for labor or if he is the man to criticize the Labor Committee. [Applause.]

You gentlemen know that the Labor Committee was organized to protect labor. It is the duty of the Labor Committee to protect labor, and may I say that as long as this Member is chairman of that committee, she is going to do her job conscientiously and the protection of labor will be her first consideration. [Applause.] Any time that anybody in this House wants to bring charges against the chairman of the Committee on Labor, let him do it. I challenge any Member to say that the Committee on Labor of this House has not performed its work and done everything that it honestly could do in the interest of labor, and orderly legislation. I beg of the gentlemen of this House who are interested in labor to support the amendment of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment. I do not know that it will be necessary for me to consume the entire 5 minutes. I think my attitude in respect to labor is generally known and my attitude as regards these excursions on the part of the Committee on Appropriations into the realm of license is also pretty well known. I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON] has admitted that he did not know whether this clipping of the item was exactly the thing to do, but by some argument or other this particular method was adopted on the part of the Committee on Appropriations. Why does the Committeee on Appropriations always assume to accomplish by the method of clipping an appropriation, that which the legislative committeee does not authorize? If the question of the elimination of this Bureau of Economics, this statistical agency, is desirable, then it appears to me that the committee to pass on that is none other than the legislative committee, namely, the Committee on Labor, and not the Committee on Appropriations. I have said this a number of times, and I repeat it. Unless this sort of method of legislating by way of the purse strings ceases, sooner or later the rights and practices of the Committee on Appropriations will be sharply abridged. I am not here to lecture the Committee on Appropriations, but I say the time is coming when this House will lay down more stringent rules for that committee to follow. This is a fundamental thing, and should not be handled by a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, when there exists a standing and important committee functioning properly which has already passed on a problem of this kind. I stand uncompromisingly for the restoration of this amount. I am in favor of the Murdock amendment. I shall interpret the vote on this amendment as defining clearly between those who are friends of labor and those who are unfriendly to labor.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Would the gentleman be kind enough to point out specifically just where there has been any usurpation of legislative power on the part of the Subcommittee on Appropriations in this specific item?

Mr. DINGELL. In every instance, when the Appropriations Committee——

Mr. KEEFE. Oh, no; in this specific item.

Mr. DINGELL. Just a moment. I am answering the gentleman's question in my own way and not the way he wants it answered, and I refuse to yield further. In every instance when the Committee on Appropriations seeks to clip a legitimate function of any agency of this Government, in my estimation it usurps the power of the legislative committee, and it ought to be stopped.

Mr. KEEFE. May I ask another question?

Mr. DINGELL. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Does the gentleman know of any law which provides for this economic research body?

Mr. DINGELL. Just the general provision of the law. It authorizes the N. L. R. B. to establish a statistical bureau as the Federal Trade Commission and the Interstate Commerce Acts authorize similar action. The same broad general outline of the law permits them to have such economic bureaus, and so it permits the National Labor Relations Board to create a similar arm within its own agency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. Those who challenge the Murdock amendment do so with, I believe, the clear-cut purpose, which they themselves do not deny, of aiming at the very heart of the National Labor Relations Act. They seek to cripple the Board by attacking what they feel is a weak point. I think it proper, therefore, in my brief remarks, to review this act from perhaps one or two standpoints.

By the creation of the National Labor Relations Board we attempted rightly through legislative channels to give to workingmen certain fundamental rights. The act gives to laborers the power to organize unions and to bargain collectively with their employers against unfair labor practices, including interference with labor organizations and discrimination against their members.

The act in itself does not set wage and hour standards for industry. It concerns itself mainly with the enforcement of the rights and privileges of the workingmen in basic industries to be free to organize in a manner and method to be determined by themselves. The authority of the Board does not extend over the collective bargaining in all industrial plants in the United States. The scope and sphere of the Board's authority is limited to firms and corporations held to be participants in interstate commerce.

The Labor Board therefore has authority to eliminate any causes of obstruction to the free flow of commerce which may result from the denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and from the refusal of employers to accept the principle of collective bargaining. The act defines unfair labor practices and lays down rules as to the representation of employees for the purpose of collective bargaining, and its judicial function consists of the power to prevent the described unfair labor practices affecting commerce.

In order to effectively enforce those provisions we have established a Labor Relations Board consisting of three members who act as a quasi-judicial body. The Labor Committee, meeting in consideration of proposed amendments, perhaps will desire a five-member board to allay certain fears that within the Board itself at the present time there has grown up a disregard for the obligations of that group.

The Board, by authority granted under the act, has broad powers of investigation, but we must remember that any person or any corporation aggrieved by a final order of the Board may obtain a review of that case in the designated courts, with the same provision as in the case of an application by the Board for the enforcement of its own orders.

I recall to the committee a decision of the United States Supreme Court on April 12, 1937, when in the majority opinion it was said:

> This is a fundamental right. Employees have as clear a right to organize and select their representatives for lawful purposes as the industrialists have to organize their business and select their own officers and agents.

The decision goes on to clearly state:

> Discrimination and coercion to prevent the free exercise of the right of employees to self-organization and representation is a proper subject for condemnation by competent legislative authority.

The social implications of that decision from the viewpoint of the laborer are tremendous. It means that the workingman can stimulate his own organization and bring about contractual relationships with his employer through collective bargaining. The spirit of the decision of the Supreme Court prevents the ocurrence of manifest injustices to those of the laboring classes who have suffered grievously for their advocacy of the principles of the right of the worker to strike and his right to collectively bargain with his employer. If this Board is allowed to go forward, unimpaired and unhampered, there will come to this country soon a fuller coordination of the industrial structure, because the laborer and the producer assume a place more equitably in proportion to the importance in the plan and organization of the industrial and commercial framework as it exists in America. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not take the position that the National Labor Relations Act is necessarily perfect, nor that I would under every circumstance oppose any amendment thereto.

I understand from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD] who spoke this afternoon that the Labor Committee has favorably considered a proposition to increase the Board membership to five. If that is the case, I expect to support that amendment.

On the other hand, I believe most earnestly that in an industrial age such as the one in which we live, the protection and preservation of the basic right of collective bargaining to labor is no more than a matter of simple justice in view of the economic inequalities between the position in which the laborer finds himself and the position in which the employer finds himself, the one without tools and without the means of making a livelihood; the other with those tools and the means of making a livelihood.

There have been a number of things said this afternoon that are convincing to me that the elimination of the functions of the Labor Board which would be required, unless the Murdock amendment is adopted, would strike at the very heart of the work of this agency in attempting to protect that right of collective bargaining. I do not believe this is the way to legislate. I do not believe it is right to try to strike down the work of any agency such as this by denying adequate funds to carry it on. I think, with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALY], that such matters should be considered on their own merits, and when they come before the House should be strictly considered so that the House may vote "yes" or "no" on them.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes; I yield briefly.

Mr. PATRICK. Did the gentleman ever hear of anybody complaining because an engine could not pull its load, and then cut off the steam?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is right. The gentleman brings up a point that is most important, because there has been complaint because the Board did not deal rapidly enough with the cases before it. I understand that the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK] has in his possession a letter from Dr. Leiserson, of the Labor Board, in which he speaks very earnestly about this matter and says that if this research division is cut out it would cripple the work of the Board considerably. I hope the gentleman will insert that letter in the RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The gentleman's statement just made accords almost exactly with my views in regard to this new agency of Government and the appropriation for it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, we have had a demonstration yesterday and today of how not to appropriate money. Mr. McEntee, director of the C. C. C., testified that we had 270,000 enrollees and that he wanted $1,000 per enrollee. All he asked for was $270,000,000. Without any consideration on the part of a committee we gave him $280,000,000, or $10,000,000 more than he asked for. That $10,000,000, Mr. Chairman, will either have to be borrowed or taxes will have to be levied for that sum.

We have also given the N. Y. A. $1,000,000 more than enough to carry on the present program as was stated a few moments ago by my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE]. We are now confronted with an amendment which would restore this item to the Budget estimate.

The gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK] said in answer to my question that he wanted to restore this item to the original Budget figures submitted to the committee. In the few moments I have this afternoon I want to discuss that part of the cut made by the committee which was intended to eliminate the promotion item of certain employees in National Labor Relations Board. I asked for certain information in connection with promotions which Mr. Madden, Chairman of the Board, placed in the hearings at my request.

You will find that last year the Board had 464 civil-service employees and 381 non-civil-service employees, a total of 845. Of the 381 non-civil-service employees 100 came from the State of New York. A group of 78 employees, all of whom except 18 were non-civil-service or political appointees, received $28,920 increases in salary last year, or an average of $371 per employee. Individual salaries of these 78 employees were increased from an average of $2,820 to $3,200 a year. Forty-six of these employees received from $400 to $1,100 increase a year, aggregating a total of $20,400.

If you vote for this amendment and restore this amount to the Budget estimate, you are voting to approve that policy and are criticizing the committee for trying to eliminate this abuse.

Out of a total of 464 civil-service employees only 13 received more than two-step promotions, but out of the 381 non-civil service or political employees 154 received promotions of two steps or more. Of these 154, 33 received 3 steps, 36 received 4 steps, 6 received 5 steps, and 3 received 6 steps of promotion in 1 year. One man received a 3-step promotion with a rating of only fair.

Mr. Chairman, in the Committee of the Whole the other day I spoke of Sam Gompers, son of that grand old man who was at the head of the American Federation of Labor for so many years. Mr. Gompers, who works in the Labor Department, refused several promotions of $200 a year in order that three employees in his department might get a promotion of $60 a year each. This abuse of promotions is unfair to the thousands of civil-service employees, many of whom have worked faithfully for years without a promotion.

No one can justify the action of the Board in making these promotions. With few exceptions every one of these promotions of three steps or more was given to lawyers. I want now to read a little of the testimony to be found in the printed hearings. Referring to regional directors the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] asked Mr. Madden:

Are there any educational qualifications required?

Mr. Madden replied—

No; no set specifications.

Mr. ENGEL. None whatever?

To this Mr. Madden answered—

We do not have them set down in writing.

Mr. ENGEL. You have no written provision that an applicant must be able to read and write the English language? You do not even make that requirement in writing?

Mr. MADDEN. We do not make any requirement in writing for these jobs.

There is absolutely no educational requirement. Again let us read the testimony.

Mr. HARE. The point that I am getting at is that it is strange to me that you are able to get these highly-trained technical people at a salary lower than you get people that have no requirements as to experience and training.

Mr. MADDEN. That is just the way the market is.

Mr. HARE. And with reference to those no experience is required.

Mr. MADDEN. That is just the way the market is. I think that it is perhaps unfortunate that some of these people, nearly all of these economists, have a Ph. D. degree which would mean

7 years of higher education, but it just happens that the market at this time for economists is in that state.

Mr. HARE. It is flooded more than the market for lawyers, is that it?

Mr. MADDEN. And it happens also that you can turn out economists more or less en masse.

Mr. ENGEL. In other words, you are paying doctors of philosophy $2,000 and doctors of hard knocks $7,000, is that the idea?

Mr. MADDEN. That is the way it works.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired; all time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. MURDOCK of Utah and Mr. HOUSTON.

The Committee divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 90, noes 160.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous expenses (other than salaries): For all authorized and necessary expenditures, other than salaries, of the Railroad Retirement Board in performing the duties imposed by law or in pursuance of law, including rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; traveling expenses, including not to exceed $1,000 for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the work of the Board when specifically authorized by the Board; not to exceed $2,500 for payment of actual transportation expenses, and per diem (not to exceed $10) in lieu of subsistence and other expenses, of persons serving while away from their homes without other compensation in an advisory capacity to the Railroad Retirement Board; repairs and alterations; contract stenographic reporting services; office appliances and labor-saving devices; supplies and equipment (including photographic equipment); not to exceed $5,000 for lawbooks, books of reference, newspapers, press clippings, periodicals, and for payment in advance when authorized by the Board for library membership in organizations which issue publications to members only or to members at a price lower than to the general public; operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and expenses incident to moving the office of the Board from one building to another; $417,000: Provided, That the Board may procure supplies and services without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (41 U. S. C. 5) when the aggregate amount does not exceed $50.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. TARVER: Page 57, line 10, strike out "$417,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$558,000."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely corrects a typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 702. No funds appropriated in this act shall be available for the appointment of persons to non-civil-service positions in the departmental service in the District of Columbia unless such appointment is not in excess of the quota of apportionment, established in the manner provided by the civil-service laws for appointment in the classified civil service, for positions (compensated by the funds in the respective titles of this act) of a non-civil-service character: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any position, the appointment of which is made by the President.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the section on the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I was aware, of course, that a point of order would be made. I am of the opinion that the language in the section is clearly a limitation on the appropriation and comes within the spirit of the Holman rule. I am advised, however, that the Parliamentarian maintains other views, and for this reason I shall not resist the sustaining of the point of order, although I desire to offer amendatory language to take the place of the stricken section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. In the opinion of the Chair, the language in lines 14 and 15, "unless such appointment is not in excess of the quota of apportionment," and so forth, is clearly subject to a point of order.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. TARVER: Page 59, after line 10, insert the following:

"SEC. 702. None of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used to pay the salary of any person appointed to a non-civil-service position under the appropriations in the respective titles of this act if the effect of such appointment is to increase the number of non-civil-service employees from the State of residence of any such non-civil-service appointee beyond the number of non-civil-service employees to which said State is entitled under the appropriations in the respective titles in this act on the basis of population: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any position the appointment of which is made by the President."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that the amendatory language proposed comes clearly within the rule and amounts merely to a limitation upon an appropriation bill.

I do not desire to detain the membership in any lengthy discussion of the matter at this late hour, but I think there can be no successful contravention of that position.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, may I submit for the consideration of the Chair that the amendment proposed is not retrenchment on its face because it does not necessarily reduce appropriations or appointments, and furthermore, because it imposes additional duties. There is no agency of the Government at the present time in position to make a daily determination with reference to whether the several agencies covered in this bill or any of them exceed the apportionment on a population basis or on the same basis as is used in the classified civil service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to inquire of the gentleman wherein additional duties are imposed under the amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, before any agency could make an appointment it would have to make a determination as to whether or not there would be any excess of non-civil-service appointments in respect to population, not merely in its own agency, but in all the other agencies covered by this appropriation bill.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, it must determine whether a party is under the civil service or not and it could not limit the qualifications of the person to receive appointment. This could not be legislation under the Holman rule because it is not necessarily retrenchment. It does impose additional duties. It contains affirmative direction and that affirmative direction is to determine whether the party is under the civil service or not. It has been repeatedly held in the House that any amendment or provision containing those directions is a violation of the rules.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, may I submit that the enforcement of any limitation upon an appropriation requires some type of administrative action. If the Chair will examine section 703, relative to administrative appointments, he will find it is essential that the Administrator determine the question of who or what employee shall be affected by that limitation. Now, I suppose there would be no insistence that that provision is out of order. There is no duty imposed upon the Administrator except that of attempting upon the basis of population to determine the quotas of each of the respective States and whether or not the number of employees from those States already in the service exceed their proportionate share according to population.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman from Georgia has just said would possibly be true if this applied to only one agency, but this bill appropriates for many different agencies. The personnel board of any one agency could not determine whether or not the non-civil-service appointments on a given day were excessive in all of the other agencies involved in this bill without imposing decided additional duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair is of the opinion that under any limitation someone must make a ruling as to whether or not a particular employee comes within the qualifications which have been set up by the Congress. The Chair has examined the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] with a great deal of care and has also looked into the precedents.

The Chair feels that all of the language used in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia is negative in character and entirely a limitation; therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 707. This act may be cited as the "Labor-Federal Security Appropriation Act, 1941."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this motion for the purpose of calling the attention of the Members of the House to certain language in the bill which has evidently been overlooked by gentlemen who offered amendments increasing the appropriation for the Civilian Conservation Corps. I call attention to the language on page 19, reading as follows:

Provided further, That expenditures under the several classes of objects of expenditure for which this appropriation is available shall not exceed by more than 10 percent the amounts estimated for such objects of expenditure by classes, in the schedule for the fiscal year 1941 appearing in the Budget for such fiscal year under this head, and any such excess must be approved in writing by the Federal Security Administrator in such amounts as he shall designate: Provided further, That the foregoing proviso shall not apply, to whatever extent the President shall direct, in the event of an emergency declared, by the President, to exist.

You will, therefore, observe that under the language of this proviso the $50,000,000 that has been added to the Civilian Conservation Corps appropriation will not be available and cannot be used for the purposes for which certain gentlemen hoped it might be used. In view of that fact it certainly seems to me that the membership of the House should not feel inclined to add $50,000,000 to the bill which cannot under the language which they have approved be used for the purposes for which they intended.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. If it is put in the bill, then made available, will it be available for any other purposes?

Mr. TARVER. No; it will simply be taken out of circulation and added to the Government's financial difficulties.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. If we vote then for this amendment keeping in the additional amount, it will show that we are for the C. C. C. and it will not do any harm anyway?

Mr. TARVER. Oh, yes. It will take $50,000,000 and appropriate that $50,000,000 for a purpose for which it cannot be used. In other words, the gentlemen voting for it would be showing their interest in the C. C. C. by adding $50,000,000 over the Budget which could not be made use of for the purposes for which they desire it to be used.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLINS. Under those circumstances we expect the gentleman from Georgia to vote for the C. C. C. amendment.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman is very optimistic.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER], the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, with a twinkle in his eye and a broad smile, has just informed the House that the $50,000,000 on which his committee voted and on which you will again vote in the House is merely a jest because of another hidden provision in the bill which he mentions, which, he says, will not permit the sum to be used or expended. Personally, I deplore the fact that the gentleman did not so inform the House until after, instead of before, the final section of the bill had been agreed upon. I am satisfied that the gentleman from Georgia is sincere in his efforts in holding appropriations down and in his plea for economy. Unfortunately, that does not apply to my Republican colleagues on the left, who are voting against all appropriations simply for the purpose of hamstringing the Departments and especially those agencies which have been created for the express purpose of protecting the labor of our country.

Mr. Chairman, earlier in the day the genial gentleman from Georgia, Judge TARVER; the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GIFFORD; and my good friend from Virginia, Judge SMITH, attacked the National Labor Relations Board and the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor, urging reduced appropriations for those agencies, which would make it impossible for those agencies to continue at anything like their full efficiency. They claim that these acts must be amended or modified, but their suggested modifications would, in effect, practically destroy them. Their advocacy of amending these acts is on the false premise that they tend to be hurtful to industry. Their objections to certain provisions of these acts are akin to those of the United States Chamber of Commerce and such outstanding labor-seducing Republicans as Mr. Thomas Girdler, of the Republic Steel Corporation; Mr. Weir, of another steel company; and, in fact, of those who directly or indirectly represent large industries and who dislike this legislation because it restricts them to some extent in the continuation of their practices and efforts to destroy organized labor.

I am satisfied that the colleagues whom I have mentioned, and even some Republicans, are misled by the misrepresentation on the part of these industrial leaders and their lobbies into believing that industry is being injured by legislation such as collective bargaining, wages and hours, and other legislative acts that we have passed in the interest of the underpaid and unfortunate wage earners of the United States. I am of the opinion that if my Democratic colleagues, and even some Republicans, instead of reading editorials in anti New Deal newspapers, propaganda publicity, and lobbyists' statements, were to peruse the financial reports appearing from day to day in these selfsame newspapers, they would hesitate and refuse to permit themselves to be deceived and used as they have been by these avaricious industrial and financial czars of our country.

Mr. Chairman, just a few moments ago, stepping in the Members' reading lobby, I glanced over the financial pages of several newspapers and I find headlines like these:

"United States Steel shows big improvement," "Bank deposits set new peak at fifty-six billions," "Rural retail sales set January record," "Individual incomes in January hold above year ago," "Construction awards show increase even in holiday week." "New York Shipbuilding pays first dividend since 1936," "Ford Motor Co. reports sharp sales increase," "Anaconda Copper net earnings climb more than 100 percent in 1939," "Rise of 60 percent in United States Steel production and shipment tonnages," "Knudsen foresees 1940 as third best year in the history of General Motors," and so forth.

Surely this does not indicate that business is going to the bow-wows, as the Republican political magicians would like to have the American people believe. Nearly every branch of American industry is making larger net profits—and larger profits, mind you, after making allowances for depreciation and all possible overhead charges, including—and do not fail to comprehend the full significance of this—provision for all Federal income taxes.

And what, think you, becomes of these increased earnings? Do they go to the workers that make them possible? Here is an item I read in yesterday's Washington (D. C.) Star that may provide the answer:

OFFICERS PAID $1,091,507 BY UNITED STATES STEEL

NEW YORK, March 27.—Proxy statements mailed to stockholders by United States Steel Corporation today for the annual meeting on May 6 showed that officers and directors of the corporation and subsidiaries were paid in 1939—on an accrual basis—$1,091,507 for services in all capacities.

Here are a few additional quotations from newspapers of the last few days that surely do not show that industry is going bankrupt:

[From the New York Times of March 28, 1940]

UNITED STATES STEEL REPORT TELLS OF UPTURN—RISE OF 60 PERCENT IN DELIVERIES

Pointing out the close relations of the affairs of the United States Steel Corporation to those of the Nation, Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., chairman of the corporation's board of directors, says in his report for 1939, issued yesterday, that production and shipment tonnages were greater than in any year since 1930, with the exceptions of 1936 and 1937. The steel-making subsidiaries delivered 11,707,251 net tons of rolled and finished steel products to customers in 1939, compared with 7,315,506 net tons in 1938, an increase of 60 percent.

[From the New York Times of March 28, 1940]

DRY-GOODS GROUP CLEARS $2,017,000

The Associated Dry Goods Corporation, in its annual report for 53 weeks ended on February 3, 1940, issued for publication today, shows a consolidated net profit of $2,017,000 after deducting all charges, including provision for Federal income taxes, * * * as compared with $787,364 for the preceding fiscal year.

Bond Stores, Inc., disclosed a net profit of $2,643,552 for 1939 after deduction for depreciation, provision for Federal income taxes, and other charges, which sum is an increase of 60 percent over the $1,651,711 net profit shown for 1938.

KNUDSEN FORESEES 1940 AS THIRD BEST YEAR IN THE HISTORY OF GENERAL MOTORS

Boston: With sales of General Motors Corporation running substantially above 1939, William S. Knudsen, president, predicted yesterday that this year's business would be the third best in the corporation's history.

ELECTRIC OUTPUT UP 10.3 PERCENT IN WEEK ENDED MARCH 23

Production of electricity by the electric light and power industry of the United States for the week ended March 23 increased 10.3 percent over the like 1939 week, according to the Edison Electric Institute.

[From the Wall Street Journal of March 28, 1940]

TIRE SHIPMENTS RISE 13.1 PERCENT IN FEBRUARY

Shipments of automobile casings during February 1940 are estimated at 13.1 percent above shipments for February 1939.

[From the Wall Street Journal of March 28, 1940]

CAR SALES CONTINUE AT RECORD PACE

DETROIT.—Sales of Pontiac cars for the first 20 days of March totaled 12,990 units, a gain of 55.7 percent over the corresponding period of March 1939 and 46 percent ahead of the first 20 days of February this year.

Used-car sales, it was reported, continued to break all records.

[From the Wall Street Journal of March 28, 1940]

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND FORTY TIN-PLATE SHIPMENTS 16 PERCENT ABOVE 1939

PITTSBURGH.—At annual meeting of stockholders of McKeesport Tin Plate Corporation, * * * stockholders were told that during the first 8 weeks of 1940, shipments were 16 percent ahead of those in the like period of 1939.

And in the Chicago Tribune, of the issue of February 28, I read this:

TRADE UPTURN BOOSTS PROFITS OF MANY FIRMS

Last year's business upturn was reflected in numerous corporation reports yesterday showing larger earnings in 1939 than in 1938. Increases ranged up to nearly 300 percent in the case of the B. F. Goodrich Co., a leading rubber manufacturer.

You will find that nearly every corporation and every industry in the United States, every large company and even most of the smaller companies, have been making more money this year and even last year than ever before in the history of our country.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois is not speaking on the bill or on any amendment, and general debate on the bill has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed in order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the tremendous increase in business and in profits of large industry during last year and the first 3 months of this year, we hear some of the Republicans bewailing the condition of business, and I know they know better. Again, on the other hand, we read editorials and articles in the daily Republican press that create the impression that the administration under President Roosevelt is destroying the business of the country. Yet, as I have stated, the financial pages of the same issue of these newspapers daily give many headlines showing dividends are being declared and profits increased. These financial reports are not alluded to by the Republican Members, and the ordinary citizen has no reason to read or peruse the financial pages.

This continuous hue and cry that high taxes retard business is nothing but a falsehood and unadulterated bunk. Business and profits have been increased and, as I stated on the floor day before yesterday, I expect that in 1940 we may have a national income close to $80,000,000,000. I also called attention, and I repeat, that the taxes paid by these high financiers with their huge profits is not anywhere near the tax paid by business people in every outstanding country in the world.

Mr. Chairman, I feel and believe that despite the shrewdness, cleverness, and misinformation circulated by these big interests groups, the masses will not be fooled. The rank and file of the wage earners, and even the misled farmers, are daily showing confidence in the New Deal and President Roosevelt.

The world's most rabid Republican newspaper, the Chicago Tribune, in yesterday's issue, while hammering and attacking the President, the New Deal, and everything connected with the administration, gave in its columns the result of a Roosevelt-Garner poll in the State of Illinois which showed that 89 percent of the people are in favor of President Roosevelt allowing his name to go before them for reelection. In view of this and similar polls throughout the Nation, I feel that the President cannot well refuse to again serve the Nation for an additional 4 years. I hope and pray that he does not refuse. If again a candidate, I feel his majority over any Republican now mentioned, or particularly that candidate that I believe a clique of the Republicans would like to and in all likelihood will nominate—Herbert Hoover—will be as large as that shown in the Illinois poll between Roosevelt and Garner. I am strengthened in this belief with every day that passes.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country know that all they can receive from the Republican Party is lip service. I have watched the fight against this legislation for the past 2 days and at no time have I seen more than nine Members of that party voting for the wage earners and youth of this country. Of that number two were Progressives, two independents, and one Farmer-Labor, and only four so-called regular Republicans, and of the latter, if I am not mistaken, two were from the Dakotas. While these were not record votes, I know that the people somehow will be informed of the duplicity of the Republicans. However, Mr. Chairman, although I did not expect anything else from the Republicans, yet I regret that some Democrats should permit themselves to be used by the Republicans.

I do not blame you Republicans for not wishing to hear what I have to say, but why the point of order on the part of the gentleman from Michigan? Is it because of that old adage "The truth hurts"? Naturally it is rather embarrassing to you. In view of the point of order raised and not wishing to violate the rules, I shall conclude, as I appreciate it is unpleasant to hear the real facts and the truth. I took the floor only at the last minute to answer the gentleman from Georgia, Judge TARVER, to resent his priding himself on the fact that he has so shrewdly withheld from the membership the fact that the sums under discussion cannot be used for the laudable purposes intended and desired.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BUCK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9007, the labor-security appropriation bill, 1941, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I request a separate vote on what is known as the Leavy amendment to the appropriation for the Civilian Conservation Corps, also on what is known as the Johnson-Collins amendment to the appropriation for the National Youth Administration.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment on which a separate vote has been demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCRUGHAM, as amended by the substitute amendment offered by Mr. LEAVY: Page 18, line 14, after the word "which", strike out "$143,130,000" and insert "$176,880,000"; and in line 18, after the word "Director", strike out $230,000,000" and insert "$280,000,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. DINGELL. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 205, nays 170, answered "present" 2, not voting 53, as follows:

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the joint resolution creating the Niagara Falls Bridge Commission and authorizing said Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Niagara River at or near the city of Niagara Falls, N. Y., approved June 16, 1938 (52 Stat. 767, ch. 490), as amended by the act of July 25, 1939 (53 Stat. 1083), be, and is hereby, amended as follows:

Insert in the third from last sentence of section 4 of said joint resolution, between the words "for" and "twenty-four months", the words "not exceeding."

SEC. 2. Section 6 of said joint resolution, as amended, is further amended in its entirety so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. Title to the bridge structure, exclusive of the approaches thereto, shall remain in the Commission until payment of the bonds and the interest thereon, or until a sinking fund sufficient for such payment shall have been provided and shall be held for that purpose, whereupon title to said bridge shall be conveyed to the State of New York and to the Canadian interests in the manner hereinafter provided. When, however, the State of New York shall be authorized by law to accept the same the Commission shall deliver to said State deeds or other suitable instruments of conveyance of the interests of the Commission in all properties or rights situated in said State theretofore acquired, other than said bridge structure, and title to all properties or interests in properties situated in the State of New York thereafter acquired, other than said bridge structure, shall be taken by the Commission in the name of said State; and when the Dominion of Canada, or any province, municipality, or agency thereof (herein referred to as the Canadian interests), shall be authorized by law to accept the same, the Commission shall deliver to such Canadian interests deeds or other suitable instruments of conveyance of the interests of the Commission in all properties or rights situated in the Dominion of Canada theretofore acquired, other than said bridge structure, and title to all properties or interests in properties situated in the Dominion of Canada thereafter acquired shall be taken by the Commission in the name of such Canadian interests. All such conveyances shall be subject to the following conditions:

"(a) That the Commission shall have the right to the use of all such properties for the construction and operation of the bridge. Any act to the contrary notwithstanding, the Commission shall commence the construction of such bridge on or before June 17, 1940, and shall complete said bridge within 3 years from said date;

"(b) That the Commission shall have the exclusive right to operate such bridge and shall be entitled to receive and apply the revenues derived from the operation of said bridge in the manner provided in said act of June 16, 1938, and acts amendatory thereof, so long as any bonds or the interest thereon, payable out of such revenues, shall remain unpaid;

"(c) That upon payment of all bonds issued by the Commission and the interest thereon, or after a sinking fund sufficient for such payment shall have been provided and held for that purpose, the Commission shall deliver deeds or other suitable instruments of conveyance of all title and interest of the Commission in and to that part of the bridge which is located within the United States to the State of New York, and shall deliver deeds or other instruments of conveyance of all title and interest in the Commission in that part of the bridge which is located within the Dominion of Canada to the Canadian interests, and thereafter the bridge shall be maintained and operated by the State of New York and by the Canadian interests in such manner as they may agree upon as a free, public bridge.

"If either the State of New York or the Canadian interests shall not be authorized to accept title to the above-described properties under such conditions, then title to all such properties shall be in the Commission, and after payment of the bonds issued by the Commission and the interest thereon, the Commission shall continue to own, maintain, and operate the bridge, and shall charge rates of tolls which shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund not exceeding the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management.

"The bridge hereby authorized or the income therefrom shall be subject to Federal, State, municipal, or local taxation only to the extent that a like structure or the income therefrom owned and operated by a public authority or public agency of the State of New York shall be subject to taxation. The bonds or obligations of the Commission, from time to time outstanding, and the income derived therefrom shall be subject to taxation in the hands of the holders thereof."

SEC. 3. That portion of section 8 of said public joint resolution as so amended be further amended by striking out the third sentence thereof reading, "After all bonds and interest thereon * * * Niagara Falls, Ontario, Canada," and substituting in lieu thereof:

"If the Commission shall have conveyed all of its properties and rights to the State of New York and to the Canadian interests, as provided in section 6 hereof, the Commission shall be dissolved and shall cease to have further existence after all bonds issued by the Commission and the interest thereon shall have been paid and all other obligations of the Commission paid or discharged, or provision for all such payments shall have been made, as hereinbefore provided. In the event that construction of such bridge is not commenced by the Commission and carried to completion within the times prescribed by section 6 hereof, the Commission shall be dissolved and shall cease to have further existence by an order of the comptroller of the State of New York, made on his own initiative or upon application of the Commission or any member or members thereof, but only after a public hearing in the city of Niagara Falls, notice of the time and place of which hearing and the purpose thereof shall have been published once, at least 30 days before the date thereof in a newspaper published in the city of Niagara Falls, N. LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I have a special order today granted me for 20 minutes. Because of the lateness of the hour I shall not use it, but ask unanimous consent that I be granted the same length of time tomorrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

SEIZURE OF AMERICAN-OWNED TIMBERLAND IN MEXICO

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the spineless policy of the administration is to blame for the recent seizure of 1,500,000 acres of American-owned timberland in Mexico. An immediate show-down in defense of American rights in Mexico is essential. Our prestige has already been impaired throughout Latin America as a result of our weak-kneed policy. The Cardenas government has repeatedly violated the rights of our citizens, seized their properties, and refused to pay adequate compensation for them.

American-owned farm lands and oil properties, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars have virtually been confiscated by the Mexican Government, without vigorous protests from President Roosevelt or the State Department. The inept and cowardly attitude of our administration encourages a continuation of the lawless and ruthless confiscation of American-owned properties in Mexico, which may spread to other South American countries.

President Roosevelt threatens sanctions against Japan because of the destruction of American properties in the war zone in far-off China, and the internationalists and warmongers of the administration denounce dictatorial governments in Europe while fawning on the "red" dictatorship in Mexico, practically ignoring the plundering of our citizens by our next-door neighbor.

We should recall Ambassador Daniels, who has failed to properly represent or protect our interests; stop buying silver from Mexico, enriching that nation, and impoverishing our own when there are still millions unemployed, and let President Cardenas know that the good-neighbor policy must be mutual to be of any value.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. COOLEY. In what respect has Ambassador Daniels failed to properly represent the Government of the United States?

Mr. FISH. Because he has not been firm enough in the last 3 or 4 years in representing our interests in that country, which have been repeatedly violated.

Mr. COOLEY. That is just the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. FISH. Oh, no. Even Democratic Members will agree with me on that.

TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I again want to call attention to the amount of tax-exempt securities that have been issued by the Federal Government, States, and counties.

On June 30, 1939, States, counties, cities, and so forth, wholly exempt, fifteen and one-tenth billion dollars.

Territories and insular possessions, wholly exempt one-tenth billion dollars.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation, partially exempt, eight-tenths billion.

Federal Home Loan System, partially exempt, two and eight-tenths billions.

Federal Farm Loan System, wholly exempt, one and two-tenths billions.

Federal Farm Loan System, partially exempt, one and three-tenths billions.

Federal Farm Loan System, total, wholly exempt and partially exempt, two and five-tenths billions.

United States Government, wholly exempt, seven and three-tenths billions.

United States Government, partially exempt, twenty-four and two-tenths billions; or a total of thirty-one and five-tenths billions.

Grand total, wholly exempt, twenty-three and eight-tenths billions.

Partially exempt, twenty-nine and five-tenths billions.

Wholly and partially exempt, fifty-three and three-tenths billions.

Every President, from President Wilson down to and including President Roosevelt, has recommended to Congress that legislation be passed to tax the income from such securities.

The staggering amount of tax-exempt and partially tax-exempt securities shows that it is possible to have a tremendous income through acquiring these securities and not pay any taxes to the Federal Government or State or subdivision thereof. As a matter of fact, in this fashion one would not be paying anything toward the cost of police protection, court rights, school purposes, or for any other governmental activity, which evasion necessarily throws a very heavy burden of taxation on the person who has property that the assessor can find. I introduced at the last session of Congress, H. R. 5632, providing for the assessment of such income. I am sorry to say that up to date I have been unable to secure any action thereon. Certainly it seems to me that the recommendation of our President in this regard should be given heed by Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, a number of Members who did not speak on the Labor Department-Federal Security Agency bill desire to extend their remarks on the bill. Permission has already been obtained for those who spoke, but I desire at this time to ask unanimous consent that all Members, whether they addressed the Committee or not, may have permission within 5 legislative days, to extend their own remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

HON. JAMES WOLFENDEN

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last a group of more than 1,200 friends and neighbors of our distinguished colleague, the dean of the Pennsylvania delegation [Mr. WOLFENDEN], tendered to him a testimonial dinner in appreciation of the services he has rendered to his community and the record he has established here in the House. At that time the distinguished minority leader gave the address of the evening. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein the address delivered by our colleague from Massachusetts, the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, neither the private nor the public life or record of the distinguished Ambassador to the Republic of Mexico needs defense at my hands, but I would not be true to the innermost feelings of my heart if I should permit this categorical and unwarranted attack upon him to pass unnoticed.

It is easy to slander the character and to smear the record of public servants, but it is difficult to establish a splendid record of public service such as has been established by the Honorable Josephus Daniels, the present Ambassador to Mexico. Nothing that the gentleman from New York may say here upon the floor of the House will dim the glory of the unselfish service and the splendid accomplishments of the Ambassador to Mexico, who early in his life dedicated himself and his talents to the welfare of his people and to the Government to which he is devoted. America is too familiar with the life and the labor of the subject of the gentleman's attack to permit a "small fry," though actuated by personal political ambitions and a crave for publicity, to defame either the reputation or the record of one who has so faithfully served his country.

Men may differ upon many matters of public interest but few men will differ upon the question of whether or not Ambassador Daniels has, with great ability, mental courage, unfaltering firmness, and with great tolerance, discharged the duties of the high position which he now occupies.

Josephus Daniels' name is a household word in all America and he ranks among the truly great men of a great and powerful nation. As Secretary of the Navy during the trying days of the World War he established a record unsurpassed in its brilliancy and did a job unprecedented in the history of this great Nation. It was Josephus Daniels who first really recognized the unusual and outstanding ability of the man who served as Under Secretary of the Navy during the World War, the man who today adorns the White House, our own President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

I challenge the correctness of the gentleman's statement to the effect that 1,500,000 acres of American-owned timberland in Mexico have recently been seized. I am under the impression that the land became involved in a controversy because of defects in the title. While I am not prepared to discuss the matter at this moment, I shall obtain the facts and at a later date present them to the House. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COOLEY asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks.

Mr. HOFFMAN asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the Senate took a recess yesterday the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] had the floor and expressed a desire to continue this morning. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I have no illusion that I can contribute anything to this debate, or that I can say anything that has not already been better said, but I have felt, for various reasons, that I should make a statement upon the matter and an analysis of the situation as I see it. One reason that prompts me to do so is the fact that when the joint resolution shall have been passed the mouths of Senators will then be substantially stopped, and trade agreements will pass out of our control, so that whatever we may have to say we will have to say now.

Mr. President, the question involved is far greater than one of profit; it is far greater than one of dollars and cents. In my own opinion—I speak for no one else—the support of the measure now pending involves lack of faith in and disapproval of fundamentals of the American Constitution. I am unable to reconcile for myself support of this measure with a firm faith in the fundamentals of our Constitution. The founders of our Government intended that the taxing power should not only be vested in but should be exercised by the Congress. The same history and experience which led the fathers to this conclusion also led them to conclude that the Congress should have reposed in it the control of foreign commerce.

I have gathered from some discussions on the floor and in the cloakroom that an impression prevails in some quarters that the regulation of foreign commerce is an executive function and not legislative; but the Constitution specifically puts the taxing power and the power to regulate commerce in the Congress.

Article I, section 1, of the Constitution says:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

There are those who seem to think there are some bodies other than the Senate and the House of Representatives which are vested with legislative powers; but the Constitution definitely and specifically confers upon the Senate and House of Representatives all legislative powers. No legislative powers are vested in any department or in any individual other than these two bodies.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution says that—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

No power to levy taxes or tariffs is vested anywhere except in Congress.

In Congress is exclusively vested the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

Whether a tariff is to raise money to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, or is for the purpose of regulating commerce, or combines the two functions, it is exclusively legislative and congressional.

Tariff laws cannot be amended or repealed except by Congress, except perhaps by a treaty.

Congress cannot delegate its legislative powers.

These are elementary statements I am making. They lie at the foundation of such argument as I have to make, and they are not disputed.

Congress cannot delegate to the President the power to amend, revise, or repeal tariff laws, or regulate foreign commerce.

What is attempted in this joint resolution? It is attempted to delegate to the President certain great powers—powers of taxation and power to regulate commerce. What is the form of the delegation? Certain purposes are recited in the act, and then it says that whenever the President "finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States," he may enter into trade agreements.

The power which the act gives to the President to enter into foreign trade agreements depends, in accordance with the act, upon his own finding. The President decides when he is to have power to enter into foreign trade agreements. He makes a finding of fact. He is required to do so. In every single instance, I think—I have examined practically all of the trade-agreement treaties—the President makes this statement in line with the general statement of the law.

The following, for instance, is quoted from the agreement with the Netherlands, and I think it is identical with all the others. It says:

Whereas I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, have found as a fact that certain existing duties and other import restrictions of the United States of America and the Kingdom of the Netherlands are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States of America, and that the purpose declared in said Tariff Act of 1930, as amended by said act of June 12, 1934, will be promoted by a foreign trade agreement between the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands—

Then he goes on to say "by reason of this, I enter into a foreign trade agreement," which follows.

There is not a finding in any of these instruments of any specific duty or any specific article which lays the groundwork of the undue burdening of commerce. The President in each instance simply makes a general finding in the words of the statute. Then, having made the finding, having by virtue of his own finding in the most general terms taken upon himself the power to enter into foreign-trade agreements, what is done? Do the agreements point out, any more than the President points out, the particular duties or rates which are unduly burdening interstate commerce? No; but in each instance a general tariff revision is undertaken.

To me it is curious that, while the foundation of the power under the law is that certain duties are unduly burdening interstate commerce, yet the law gives to the President the power to continue in effect duties. In other words, an act for the purpose of correcting duties gives the power to continue, should he wish, those very duties. We can understand, perhaps, the power to change, but the power to continue is another matter.

The act goes on, after the trade agreements are made:

> The President may at any time terminate any such proclamation in whole or in part.

And there is no specification of cause or occasion upon which he shall exercise that power.

If we were to concede the validity of the power to make the agreement, which is a process of lawmaking, by what process can we deduce a rule, a standard of delegation, when the President is given unqualified authority to rescind the law which has been made, with no specification of occasion or purpose, but simply a naked authorization?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, would the Senator care to yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. WHITE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator if it is not entirely agreeable.

Mr. ADAMS. I am merely under a little pressure of time, but I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. WHITE. I understand the Senator's contention to be that the authority of the President exists only when he finds that a specific duty is unduly burdening commerce. Is that correct?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. And when he undertakes to say that an article on the free list shall be bound indefinitely on the free list, he is not finding that the absence of duty in that instance is unduly burdening interstate or foreign commerce. Is that correct?

Mr. ADAMS. And, of course, I say to the Senator that there is a finding of fact that certain duties are unduly burdening commerce, but there is no specification as to what the articles or the items are. Then there is no limitation upon the President as to the changes he may make in the schedules. He may have entered into the negotiations upon the theory that a certain item was the basis of discrimination burdening commerce; but, having made that finding, he proceeds to enter upon a process of tariff bargaining without limitation as to the subjects to be taken up, and only a limitation as to the amount of change which he may make.

Mr. WHITE. But if he freezes a duty, he is either continuing something that burdens commerce, which the statute says he shall remove, or——

Mr. ADAMS. When he freezes a duty he says to the Senator from Maine and 95 other Senators, and 435 Representatives, "You no longer have any right to legislate on this article. I have given up your right to legislate on this article for the period for which this trade agreement lasts unless I see fit to change it."

Mr. WHITE. And that action is not predicated upon or does not rest upon the power to remove abuses; otherwise he would not have continued the duty.

Mr. ADAMS. It rests upon that power, but it goes away beyond the necessity for correcting the abuses.

As I have tried to show the Senate, amendments to a tariff act can be made only by a legislative act. I am eliminating the treaty phase of the matter. A tariff act is a law. Nothing other than an act of governmental authority equal to it can amend it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HATCH. In the view the Senator is now expressing, in eliminating the treaty theory——

Mr. ADAMS. I am coming to that.

Mr. HATCH. I will not anticipate the Senator, then. I will wait until he reaches that point.

Mr. ADAMS. It is recognized that Congress may pass an act setting out the law and delegating the process of enforcement. Now I think I shall read just a paragraph or two from the brief filed by the supporters of the agreement in the hearings. The case of Field against Clark is commonly the basic case. I am not going back to the case of the brig Aurora; but in Field against Clark the Supreme Court of the United States said—and it is conceded to be the basic doctrine; I think there is no question about it—

> That Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution.

The Court proceeds to point out in the particular case that—

> As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

That, I think, is the undisputed law. What is it that is relied upon to justify the delegation of authority in this act? The Trade Agreements Act contains this statement of purpose:

> For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce) by regulating the admission of goods into the United States.

Those are the purposes specified, and they are relied upon as laying down a standard or rule, or, as stated in the Hampton case, an intelligible principle.

The distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], if I recall correctly, yesterday emphasized the statement in the Hampton case that there should be an intelligible principle, that that was required, and that the adoption of the method of reciprocal-trade bargaining would constitute such a principle.

In the Hampton case the court, in its specification of the statement as to an intelligible principle, adds this, which greatly qualifies the statement:

> If Congress shall lay down, by legislative act, an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rate is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power.

When the court uses the term "intelligible principle" it means, of course, an applicable principle, one which will serve as a formula in working out tariff changes. It cannot be merely what we might designate as an intelligible principle on some remote matter, some hope, some desire, but it must be a principle which can be applied to the particular problem of fixing the rates, and, as the court says, "to which the person or body authorized to fix such rate is directed to conform."

My studies have failed to show to me the existence of a rule, a standard, an intelligible principle, in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, binding or directing the President in the making of reciprocal-trade agreements. He is expected to enter into reciprocal-trade agreements in order that he may effectuate certain great purposes, which could well be reduced to the statement "to promote the general welfare." If we delegate authority to the President to do an act of this kind whenever he thinks, after consideration of existing facts, it will be in the interest of the public welfare, we abandon the principle prohibiting the delegation of legislative authority by the Congress. I think that is the situation.

Mr. President, as to the standards, the case of the Panama Oil Co. v. Ryan (293 U. S.) has been quoted repeatedly. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States expressed its opinion upon the question of standards. That is not parallel with the case before us, but in that case the Court expressed its opinion upon the question of standards, I think, rather clearly. It quotes, first, the bases upon which the President could act, and it says:

> We turn to the other provisions of title I of the act. The first section is a "declaration of policy."

As in the case before us—

> It declares that a national emergency exists "which is productive of widespread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate and foreign commerce—

Similar phrases to what we have heard in connection with the issue before us—> affects public welfare, and undermines the standards of living of the American people." It is declared to be the policy of Congress "to remove obstructions to the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce which tend to diminish the amount thereof"; "to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups"; "to induce and maintain united action of labor and management under adequate governmental sanctions and supervision"; "to eliminate unfair competitive proctices; to promote the fullest possible utilization of the present productive capacity of industries; to avoid undue restriction of production (except as may be temporarily required); to increase the consumption of industrial and agricultural products by increasing purchasing power; to reduce and relieve unemployment; to improve standards of labor; and otherwise to rehabilitate industry and to conserve national resources."

The Court then said:

> This general outline of policy contains nothing as to the circumstances or conditions in which transportation of petroleum or petroleum products should be prohibited.

The Court further said:

> The Congress left the matter to the President without standard or rule, to be dealt with as he pleased. The effort by ingenious and diligent construction to supply a criterion still permits such a breadth of authorized action as essentially to commit to the President the functions of a legislature rather than those of an executive or administrative officer executing a declared legislative policy.

As I have said, I have been unable in my study to find any rule, any standard, any formula, which controls or directs or guides the President in his negotiation of reciprocal-trade agreements. When the President finds as a fact that certain duties, either of the United States or of a foreign government, are undoubtedly burdening commerce, he may act. Of course, the purpose of the imposition of duties by foreign governments is to burden commerce, to an extent; the purpose is to protect their internal markets, as we do ours. Whenever the President finds that any duties are burdening foreign commerce, then by making a finding himself he has for himself the power to make reciprocal-trade agreements, without limitation as to subjects, within the 50-percent limit as to rates.

What authority is left to the President when he makes such a finding? He is to select the items to be considered. There is no control of any kind even suggested in the act as to what item shall be included in a reciprocal-trade agreement. Second, he shall fix the rate. What is there to a tariff law but the articles to be named and the rates to be fixed? In other words, the whole body, substance, and soul of the making of a Tariff Act is delegated to the President, with one restriction only; that is, as to the extent of the change he may make in a rate.

I am unable to conceive of a clearer delegation of legislative authority; and, mind you, Mr. President, every single item in a reciprocal-trade agreement is an amendment of an existing law, involving the change of a rate here or there. Every item is a repeal or an amendment of an existing law. So we have the President, under a direction for a fine purpose, made the legislative body of this country.

In my judgment, when the President made these treaties, he made the law; he exercised legislative power. We know from the group of 22 treaties that there has been a general revision of the tariff laws of the United States. The tariff rates on more than 1,000 items have been changed in the 22 trade agreements, many of them minor items, most of them not justifying the contention that they individually burdened interstate or foreign commerce. There has been put into effect a theory, an economic theory, a tax theory, not a theory of this body, not a theory of the Congress, but the tax theory of a very distinguished, a very able, a very earnest, a very honest man.

Mr. President, I find no fault with the Secretary of State. He is carrying out a program, as he should be expected to, which he honestly believes to be for the welfare of his country. When he was a Member of the Congress of the United States, the Congress declined to a large extent to accept his theories as to tariff matters. Now, no longer responsible to a popular vote—and we know that as a practical matter he is making reciprocal-trade agreements—he is putting into effect his own economic theories. I do not criticize him. He believes they are for the welfare of our country. The criticism is of the Senate, and the body at the other end of the Capitol Building, that have sought to give away their authority in respect to tariff matters. I do not criticize any man for using the power that is given to him, and I know it is human to reach out for increased power.

Mr. President, a tariff agreement itself changes the tariff law. That is not particularly material. The President does not himself change the American tariff law, but it is the combined effort of the United States with Great Britain or the Netherlands or Brazil, by a two-party agreement, which changes the law. Not only have we delegated our authority in this respect to the President, but the foreign nations involved are participating in making the instruments. The President merely proclaims the changes in the law which are made by two-party agreements. The schedules are specifically made part of the agreements. The schedules are contained in every agreement, and reference is made to the pages and paragraphs of the tariff law. So the Queen of the Netherlands, for instance, and Cordell Hull, are by an agreement changing the American tariff laws. We may say that is not a delegation of legislative power. I suppose we have the right to make some delegation to the Queen of the Netherlands or to the President of Brazil if we desire to do so.

Mr. President, my theory is that these agreements, as they are set up, are legislative in their character. They change the law. Under the Tariff Act of 1890, coffee, for instance, was admitted to the United States free of duty. There was a provision in the tariff law that if the President should find that the tariff rates imposed by Brazil were unequal and unreasonable, it was his duty to suspend the provision for the free admission of coffee. He made the finding; he suspended the free list, and coffee became subject to a duty of 3 cents a pound. When the importer found that the duty on coffee was 3 cents a pound, instead of being on the free list, he did not have any trouble in finding out how or why it was done. The duty was fixed in the very letter of the law, which provided that if the President found discriminations, he should take coffee from the free list and impose a duty of 3 cents a pound. In other words, the provision with respect to the change of coffee from the free list, and the imposition of a duty, and the rate of duty of 3 cents a pound, were fixed in the law, and Brazil had nothing to say about it. We were then making our own tariff laws.

Today we would have to negotiate with Brazil about the matter. What I mean particularly to impress upon the Senate is that at that time the law contained the definition of the two vital things, both of which are lacking in the trade-agreements law.

In the subsequent act, the flexible tariff law, it will be found that a provision was made for the adjustment of duties according to a standard What was the standard? The standard provided that the difference in cost at home and abroad should be equalized by the tariff. The President had no authority to make a change until the Tariff Commission had investigated and reported to him what the difference was between the cost at home and abroad, and then he could only declare and act upon the subject which had been investigated, and in accordance with the rates recommended by the Tariff Commission. That provision was upheld, and the Court, I think, very properly said there was an intelligible principle. There was a purpose and a formula. In the Trade Agreements Act there is a collection of purposes—not a single purpose but a collection of purposes—and no formula. No person knows and no person can know what products are to be used as a basis for reciprocal-trade agreements. No person knows what the changes may be. There is no formula provided. There is no specification by which the changes can be anticipated.

Of course, there is a committee on reciprocal trade agreements information, or something like that, which is made up of very learned men, who secured their places by appointment, who have never gone through the fire of securing public approval. I have been before that committee with other Members of the Senate. One could not ask for a more courteous body than this group of men, who sit and listen perhaps to what is said. There is a room full of people, perhaps 75 or 100 persons in the room at one time, all anxious to be heard the same morning. Of course, a Senator is given preference. He will be heard first, but heard not by those to whom the authority has been delegated and not by men who are in any way responsive to the people. Those to whom he speaks are putting into effect their theories of tariff making, utterly regardless of what Senators—I will not say all Senators, I will say what many Senators—may think.

Mr. President, by this act we have turned over authority to the President and the Secretary of State to go out into the world of trade and make any deal they may think best. That is the principle of reciprocal-trade agreements. It seems that our State Department may go out in the world and negotiate. It may say to a foreign nation, "If you will reduce your duty on a certain article, we will reduce our duty on some other article." That is stated to be an intelligible principle upon which they are justified in exercising the power of fixing rates. Of course, those who do the work cannot do anything other than what Congress has authorized them and told them to do. We cannot tell them to make the law; but we have told them to negotiate trade agreements, and they have done so. The question also before the Senate today is whether or not other bodies, other groups, shall exercise the power delegated by the Constitution to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, as I have said, it is not a matter of dollars and cents, it is not a matter of profit, but it is a matter of fundamental principle. The question is whether or not the Senate believes in the Constitution. If we do not like it, we have a way of amending it. If we believe in it, I think we should abide by it.

With what are the hearings filled? They are filled with statistics and statements concerning economic benefits which may result from taking certain steps. I am not disputing the information contained in them. I am not opposed to the reciprocal trade agreement method. I think the bargaining method is all right. I do not want to see a recurrence of logrolling, but I am not particularly enthusiastic about having logrolling merely removed from the Senate to the State Department. That is what is happening.

All that I think should be done is to let the negotiators from the executive department go out and see what they can do. They are our agents. But they do not want to come back to their principal for his approval. They want to be an agent with final authority and have almost a contempt for their principal.

Mr. President, the fact that motives are good and results are profitable does not make delegation valid.

How do these agreements work? I will give an illustration or two. I shall speak of some things about which I know. One of them is sugar. Under the flexible provision of the Tariff Act the President, after having received a statement from the Tariff Commission that the duty did not equalize the difference in cost at home and abroad, following the recommendation of the Tariff Commission, reduced the duty on Cuban sugar from $2 to $1.50, thereby putting Cuba and America upon an equal basis as to sugar production. Then a reciprocal-trade agreement was made with Cuba, and the President reduced the duty 60 cents below the rate fixed by himself, on the basis of equalizing the cost of production at home and abroad.

Let me ask the Senate whether that complies with the law? Why are these things done? What is the purpose? The purpose is to restore the American standard of living. Was the American standard of living restored by reducing, as occurred necessarily, the wages in the sugar-beet fields?

Again the purpose is to increase the purchasing power of the American public. Is that accomplished by striking down an industry? Does that result in increasing the purchasing power of the American public?

Another purpose—and this is a good one, Mr. President—is to establish and maintain a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce. The price of sugar has been cut in order to establish better relationships. That is the standard which is laid down, by which the President determines that sugar should be dealt with in an agreement, and that the tariff should be reduced 60 cents. These purposes do not fix the standards and they are not accurate.

Mr. President, I am trying to observe the understanding which I have with the very distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Again speaking of something with which I am familiar, take cattle as an illustration. After the American stock raiser has killed 8,000,000 head of his stock because his ranges were overstocked, we admit from Canada 200,000 large-size animals and 100,000 of another kind. We reduce the duty on dairy stock; we reduce the duty on cheese; we reduce the duty on lumber, on shingles, on potatoes, and on metals, all for the purpose of increasing employment in America, restoring the American standard of living, and increasing American purchasing power. Those are fine purposes, but in no way connected with the things which are done. I am saying this merely to illustrate that no formula is set out in the act which in any way determines the President's course, and he is left as an untrammeled legislative agent to make the law.

There has been some comment about treaties. If these agreements are treaties, they may, of course, be negotiated without the authority of Congress. Congress does not have to authorize the President to negotiate treaties. However, as the Constitution provides, the taxing power is held in Congress. The power to regulate foreign commerce is a congressional power. The Constitution provides that while the President may negotiate treaties, they shall not become valid until approved by two-thirds of the Senators present. In other words, in the legislative body was vested the final word on taxes, on interstate and foreign commerce, and on making treaties.

In the case of treaties there is no question of delegation of power. A treaty may include as wide a field as the treaty makers see fit. The question of delegation of power applies only to the legislative act. If an agreement comes in as a treaty, questions of delegation of power are eliminated. Treaties may be eliminated as to the past, because if trade agreements are treaties there are 22 void treaties, since no one of them has been ratified by the Senate.

Of course, the sponsors of the joint resolution say that the agreements are not treaties. That is a necessary premise for them to take, because the agreements are void if they are treaties. Necessarily, the sponsors have to say that they are not treaties. If they are not treaties, then the only source of authority for their execution is congressional power, legislative power; and their execution must be pursuant to a valid delegation of power in the execution of a law enacted by Congress, in which the whole framework of the law is set out, only the details being left to the agents.

An effort has been made to recognize a certain new legal creature. We speak of "executive agreements." In the executive field we may have a perfectly proper executive agreement, entered into by the President, which does not require authority from Congress. As the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, he may make agreements in many fields. If the executive agreement is to render effective the reciprocal-trade agreements, they must come back, not into the executive field but into the legislative field. They must be sustained. However, in the briefs which have been filed and in the arguments which have been made a sort of hybrid has been created under the name of "executive agreement."

Executive agreements are enough like treaties to escape the constitutional objection to the delegation of legislative power; and they are enough like legislative authority to avoid ratification as treaties; that is, the executive agreements go down the middle of the road, escape the requirement for ratification as treaties, and escape the doctrine of delegation of power. But they must stand, if at all, upon the legislative basis. The mere fact that they are called executive agreements does not change the fact. So I think the executive-agreement theory does not add anything to them. If they are treaties, they must be ratified. If they are not treaties, they must have the fundamental legislative authorization, which must not be in excess of the delegation.

I think the situation resolves itself into certain rather definite points. As I have said, we are seeking to give an agent authority. Every particle of authority which the Secretary of State and the President exercise in connection with these agreements comes from the Congress. They act as the agents of the Congress. In the execution of trade agreements they have no authority from any other source. Again I am eliminating the question of treaties, because, of course, if the agreements were treaties, they would have to be ratified. For the purpose of this discussion, treaties are out. However, a number of Members of this body regard these instruments as treaties. I think the argument of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to the effect that they are treaties has not been answered. But there is no need of our further debating that phase of the question.

What is the situation? What do our agents in the execution of these agreements say about us? They object to having the reciprocal-trade agreements submitted to Congress to obtain from the Congress authority to make them. The Secretary of State said, at page 35 of the House hearings:

> I think the first time an agreement came up for approval, there would remain, after the Senate got through, neither the shadow nor the substance.

That is the compliment which the Secretary of State pays this body. If he, as our agent, should come to us and submit to us the work which he has done under our authorization, we would tear it apart.

Mr. Grady, First Assistant Secretary of State, in charge of these agreements, says:

> If ratification were required it would be a complete black-out. Ratification is tantamount to repeal.

Such statements are nothing less than a gross reflection upon the character and capacity of the Senate of the United States. Senators may "take it" if they like it. Whenever they vote to pass the joint resolution, they accept the statements which have been made that we are not competent to exercise the powers which the Constitution vested in us. That is the premise of the argument.

Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that if a good treaty or a good agreement were submitted to us it would be ratified by the Senate, and that if it were not a good one it ought not to be ratified. I think the passage of the joint resolution involves a repudiation of the fundamentals of our Government. I am speaking only for myself. No one else need agree with me. However, I could not vote for a measure which is founded upon the premise that if the work of our agents were submitted for approval we would so tear it apart that neither shadow nor the substance would remain. It has been said throughout the land that ratification means wrecking the reciprocal-trade agreements.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The charge has been made over and over again that if the principal, which is the Congress, should be given the opportunity to pass upon the work of the agent, which is the executive arm to which the delegation of power is made, the principal would not only wreck the work of the agent, as the Senator has pointed out, but would also engage in unseemly logrolling. Is it not a fact that if the agreements were to come to the Senate for ratification as treaties they would have to be passed upon as units, and that it would be impossible to deal with specific items and engage in the logrolling practice which has been denounced?

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator is absolutely correct. There has been the most unfair propaganda on that subject. There has been an effort to say to the country that the Senate would engage in unseemly logrolling if trade agreements were submitted to it. As a matter of fact, when the Secretary negotiates each individual item, he is engaged in what? In trading. What is logrolling? It is trading. He is engaged in trading. All that would be left to the Senate of the United States if a trade agreement should be submitted to it would be to say we approve or we disapprove of the agreement as a whole. We could not amend it. We would accept it or reject it. In other words, it seems to be proper to translate logrolling into the executive field, but improper to permit Senators from the individual States to have an opportunity upon the floor of the Senate to represent the people who sent them here in connection with tariff matters.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, is it not a fact that it is impossible for the Secretary of State himself to pass upon all the innumerable items and duties in the innumerable trade agreements that can be negotiated?

Mr. ADAMS. Of course, there are a thousand items included in the agreements already negotiated.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So that it becomes necessary for the Secretary of State himself to redelegate the power which we now delegate to him.

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. What protection is there to the public of the United States and to the industries of the United States against the possibility of logrolling by the second- and third-degree delegates, so to speak, of our legislative authority?

Mr. ADAMS. Not only is there no protection but I think it is a very definite violation of our obligations. The Constitution vests in us these powers. If we are not competent, what we ought to do is to let somebody else have our place. If the system is wrong, if the Constitution is wrong, let us amend it; let us make the executive the legislative, the taxing power. Strange to say, as the Senator from Wyoming realizes, in the little group that is really making new tariffs there are certain sections of the country which do not seem to be represented, while in this body every section of the country has representation and a spokesman. I refer particularly to a large section of the West which, evidently, is regarded as a sort of stepchild in the economic field. When a trade agreement is negotiated something has to be given or conceded in order to get something. What has been done? I have not wanted to argue the economics of the question, but in my section of the country we have been a source of materials to be traded off in order that something might be obtained. It so happens that the major industries of my section are among those that have been traded off in order that benefits might come to other sections, and without a chance on our part to complain. If such matters were submitted to the Senate, then if the State of Colorado should lose in the discussion and action on the floor, we would have to take it and put up with it; but to be made a victim at the hands of a group of individuals is a little difficult to accept.

Mr. President, the best part of my remarks I will have to defer because the Senator from Tennessee is anxious to proceed. I hope he will recognize that in surrendering the floor to him I am omitting the best part of my speech in order to accommodate him. The remainder of it would be thoroughly persuasive, but if I should take the time he would not be able to speak.

I desire merely to add one suggestion, namely, that if these agreements are treaties they must be ratified; if they are trade agreements, and are not treaties, they should be ratified. If they are proper delegations of authority they do not need ratification; if they are excessive delegations they should be submitted to the Senate. In other words, I think that these agreements should come back to this body for approval, regardless of whether they are valid, regardless of other circumstances. I think we can do no less than to demand the return to the Senate of these agreements for our approval or rejection, regardless of what they may be called, not as a matter of validity necessarily but in order that we may fulfill our obligations. For one, I am not willing to say that an individual in the executive arm of the Government shall have in his uncontrolled discretion the economic welfare of the country; and that is what the present system means. The man who controls the taxing power controls the welfare of the country. We are putting it in a single hand.

I remind Senators who have great confidence in those now in office that the term of office of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull will end on the 20th of January 1941, and from then on we are legislating for the execution of binding reciprocal-trade agreements by men who will follow them whose theories may be different.

So I cannot understand why Senators should object to having a trade agreement brought to him for his approval. For the life of me, I cannot understand why any Senator should be unwilling to have an opportunity to approve or disapprove fundamental acts such as these are in our economic system. Yet if we pass the joint resolution, I say again, in my judgment, we defy the Constitution; we express our distrust and disapproval of its fundamental provisions; and, what is worse, we admit the charge that is made against us, that the Senate of the United States is not competent to exercise the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution. For myself I am willing to make no such admission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The Chair recognizes the senior Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators have answered the roll call. A quorum is present.

May the Chair request that conversation on the Senate floor and in the galleries be suspended so that the Senate may listen to the discussion? The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to enable me to put something in the RECORD?

Mr. McKELLAR. My time is very limited, and I have yielded a great deal; but I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD as a part of this debate a letter addressed by me to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], in which I reply to a letter written by Secretary Hull to the Senator from Mississippi on March 27.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 29, 1940.

Hon. PAT HARRISON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: On March 27 Secretary Hull, in a letter addressed to you which you had inserted in the RECORD, paid me the honor of referring to a statement made by me on the previous day. I do not desire to provoke a controversy, but certain points raised by the Secretary do require an answer.

In the statement referred to by the Secretary I asserted that the supplemental agreement with Cuba signed on December 18, 1939, deprived domestic producers of an important protection afforded them under the original Cuban trade agreement. Since December 18 the tariff on Cuban sugar remains at 90 cents a hundred pounds whether or not quotas are in effect. Originally we had either quotas or tariff protection. No longer is that true. Mr. Hull did not question the accuracy of that statement.

I also stated that the domestic sugar producers during periods of suspended quotas must submit to unrestricted competition of Cuban sugar admitted at a pitifully low, inadequate, and insufficient rate of tariff and must continue to pay the processing excise tax.

Mr. Hull complains that during the period of suspended quotas when tariffs were restored to the rate established by the United States Tariff Commission to offset the actual difference in the cost of production, proportionately less sugar from Cuba entered the United States. This seems to prove that tariffs are more effective than quotas in protecting domestic sugar if it proves anything.

When the quotas were suspended and the tariff was restored, the Cuban sugar interests did not dump their sugar surplus. They had a better plan; they began a vigorous drive on the State Department for a lower tariff. They were not satisfied with quota suspension alone; they sought a suspended quota and a low tariff, and on December 18, 1939, the State Department granted them exactly what they sought. On the floor of the Senate on March 26, Senator ELLENDER dramatically pointed out how the Cuban sugar interests took advantage of the President's proclamations.

From January 1 through August 31, 1939, Cuba sent to the United States 2,113,848,773 pounds (roughly 1,057,000 short tons) of sugar. This, according to Senator ELLENDER, is an average of 260,000,000 pounds (130,000 short tons) a month. From September 1 to September 11, the period immediately preceding the suspension of the quotas, and the period in which the rapid advance in prices occurred, Cuba dumped 531,550,322 pounds (265,000 short tons) of sugar into our markets. In other words, in this brief period she doubled the rate of her shipments to this country, and all of that sugar, of course, benefited by the higher price and the 90-cent tariff.

But what happened when the quotas were suspended by the President in order—quoting Secretary Hull's letter—"to make larger supplies available"? What happened was that Cuba drastically cut the rate of her sugar shipments to the United States and waited for a reduction in the duty to take place. In the period from September 12, the day after the quotas were suspended, until December 26, when the lower rate of duty again became effective, Cuba sent us only 531,141,282 pounds (265,570 short tons) of sugar, or an average of about 106,000 tons a month.

Happily, from the Cubans' viewpoint, the President on December 26 gave notice that quotas would be restored on January 1, and in the period from December 26 to the end of the year all Cuban sugar was admitted at the 90-cent rate. Cuban producers no longer exhibited any reluctance to enter the American market. Indeed, it was exactly the thing they had been waiting for. And in that brief period they entered—so Senator ELLENDER's statistics show—568,156,174 pounds (285,000 tons) of sugar. On this amount of sugar Cuba saved and the United States Treasury lost about $3,400,000 in tariff duties.

Secretary Hull complains that the increase in the rate of duty was "to reduce our imports of Cuban sugar very substantially." It is true, as the citations above demonstrate, the Cuban sugar imports were below normal, while Cuba was waiting for a reduction in the tariff. But it is wholly inaccurate to imply that there was any important reduction in the total amount of sugar which Cuba supplied to us during 1939. By dumping her sugar into our markets in the 2 weeks before the duty was increased, and again in the 5 days after the duty was reduced, Cuba managed to send us 1,930,221 short tons against an original quota of 1,932,343 tons. This is a difference of 2,122 tons, or about one-tenth of 1 percent. I do not agree with Secretary Hull that that is a "very substantial" reduction in Cuba imports.

On the other hand, if we accept the statement that the increase in the rate of duty "very substantially" reduced Cuban exports to the United States, Mr. Hull is still further from proving his position.

Secretary Hull, in his letter of March 27 to you, suggests that I should agree that it was right and equitable that the American public should be protected by lowering sugar tariffs during periods of quota suspension. I cannot agree that the concession in tariff rates made to Cuba on December 18, 1939, was either justified or equitable on any basis whatever. The price flurry in September caused by the war had almost completely subsided more than a month prior to the signing of the supplementary agreement on December 18, 1939, which reduced the tariff 60 cents.

Retail prices which resulted from the war scare were short lived. On September 15 the average retail price of sugar, as reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, was 6.4 cents a pound. In each of the weeks that followed the price became lower and lower, and today the price is back to 5.3 cents, or within a fraction of a cent of the depressed price which prevailed for 18 months prior to September 1. If it is true that Cuban imports of sugar were "very substantially" reduced, then it must be perfectly clear that the progressive decrease in prices is not to be credited to Cuba's making greater supplies available. The only explanation of the lowered prices is that the domestic sugar industry drew upon its reserves and made sugar available at declining prices during a period when Cuba was unwilling to do so. Certainly this is the kind of protection the consumer can understand. It is the kind of protection for the consumer which the domestic sugar industry has provided ever since it has been able to offer effective competition to Cuba and other foreign sugar producers. It is a type of protection beside which Mr. Hull's tariff theories are pale and impotent.

Sincerely yours,

E. C. JOHNSON.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I do not intend to take the time of the Senate to discuss the pending amendment, further than to say that it presents only one question; that is, whether or not, under the Constitution, agreements negotiated under the Trade Agreements Act are treaties. If they are not treaties, then clearly the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is not a proper amendment. I have concluded that they are not treaties.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point, as part of my remarks, a quotation from the book entitled "Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement," by Crandall; one from Forty-sixth Yale Law Journal; one from Two Hundred and Ninety-seventh United States Reports; one from Two Hundred and Ninety-ninth United States Reports; and one from Three Hundred and First United States Reports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement (2d ed.), by Samuel B. Crandall, Ph. D., p. 121]

CHAPTER IX.—AGREEMENTS REACHED BY THE EXECUTIVE IN VIRTUE OF ACTS OF CONGRESS

SEC. 62. Navigation and commerce: The act of March 3, 1815, declared a repeal of so much of any act as imposed discriminating duties against the vessels, and the products of the country to which the vessel belonged imported therein, of any country in which discriminating duties against the United States did not exist, the President to determine in each instance the application of the repeal.[1] The acts of January 7, 1824, and May 24, 1828, likewise directed the President to suspend by proclamation discriminating duties so far as they affected the vessels of a foreign nation, when possessed of satisfactory evidence that no such discriminating duties were imposed by that nation on the vessels of the United States.[2] Section 11 of the act of June 19, 1886, as amended by the act of April 4, 1888, entrusted duties of similar character to the President.[3] A partial suspension is allowed by the act of July 24, 1897.[4] On the authority of these statutes numerous arrangements have been reached with foreign countries and made operative by proclamation. The evidence accepted by the President as sufficient may be recorded in a note or dispatch or a memorandum of an agreement. The proclamations for the removal of discriminating duties on trade with Cuba and Puerto Rico of February 14, 1884, October 27, 1886, and September 21, 1887, were based on memoranda of agreements with the Spanish Government signed, respectively, February 13, 1884, October 27, 1886, and September 21, 1887.[5]

Section 3 of the tariff act of October 1, 1890, authorized and directed the President, whenever the government of any country, producing and exporting certain enumerated articles, imposed duties or made other exactions on the products of the United States, which, in view of the free introduction of the enumerated articles into the United States, were in his opinion reciprocally unreasonable and unequal, to suspend by proclamation as to that country the privilege of free importation, and to subject the articles in question to certain prescribed discriminating duties.[6] Ten commercial arrangements were concluded and made effective in virtue of this section—January 31, 1891, with Brazil; June 4, 1891, with the Dominican Republic; June 16, 1891, with Spain; December 30, 1891, with Guatemala; January 30, 1892, with Germany; February 1, 1892, with Great Britain; March 11, 1892, with Nicaragua; April 29, 1892, with Honduras; May 25, 1892, with Austria-Hungary; and November 29, 1892, with Salvador. These were all terminated by section 71 of the tariff act of August 27, 1894.[7] Section 3 of the act of 1890, having been assailed as an attempt to delegate legislative and treaty-making powers, was upheld by the Supreme Court in the case of Field v. Clark. Speaking for the court, Mr. Justice Harlan said: "As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. * * * The court is of opinion that the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not liable to the objection that it transfers legislative and treaty-making power to the President."[8] Section 3 of the act of July 24, 1897, provided not only, as did section 3 of the act of 1890, for the imposition by proclamation of certain differential rates, but also for the conclusion by the President of commercial agreements with countries producing certain enumerated articles, in which concessions should be secured in favor of the products of the United States; and it further authorized the President, when such concessions were in his judgment reciprocal and equivalent, to suspend by proclamation the collection on these articles of the regular duties imposed by the act, and to subject them to special rates as provided for in the section.[9] On the authority of this section the President concluded and made effective the commercial agreements of May 28, 1898, August 20, 1902, and January 28, 1908, with France; of May 22, 1899 (protocol making corrections of January 11, 1900), and November 19, 1902, with Portugal; of July 10, 1900, February 27, 1906, and April 22–May 2, 1907, with Germany;[10] of February 8, 1900, and March 2, 1909, with Italy; of January 1, 1906, with Switzerland; of August 1, 1906, and February 20, 1909, with Spain; of September 15, 1906, with Bulgaria; of May 16, 1907, with the Netherlands; and of November 19, 1907, with Great Britain. Full force and effect has been given to these agreements by the courts;[11] and it has been held by the Supreme Court that such agreements come within the meaning and intent of the word "treaty" as used in the Circuit Court of Appeals Act giving the right of review by direct appeal when the validity or construction of any treaty made under the authority of the United States is drawn in question. Mr. Justice Day, speaking for the Court, said: "While it may be true that this commercial agreement, made under authority of the Tariff Act of 1897, section 3, was not a treaty possessing the dignity of one requiring ratification by the Senate of the United States, it was an international compact, negotiated between the representatives of two sovereign nations and made in the name and on behalf of the contracting countries, and dealing with important commercial relations between the two countries, and was proclaimed by the President. If not technically a treaty requiring ratification, nevertheless it was a compact authorized by the Congress of the United States, negotiated and proclaimed under the authority of its President. We think such a compact is a treaty under the Circuit Court of Appeals Act, and, where its construction is directly involved, as it is here, there is a right of review by direct appeal to this Court."[12] In section 2 of the Tariff Act of August 5, 1909, it was provided that whenever and so long thereafter as the President should be satisfied, in view of the concessions granted by the minimum tariff of the United States, that the government of any foreign country imposed no restrictions or exactions of any character upon the importation or sale of products of the United States, which unduly discriminated against the United States or its products, and that such foreign country paid no export bounty or imposed no export duty or prohibition upon exportations to the United States which unduly discriminated against the United States or its products, and that such country accorded to the products of the United States treatment which was reciprocal and equivalent, upon proclamation to this effect by the President, articles from such country imported into the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila) should be admitted under the minimum tariff.[13] The maximum tariff imposed by the act became effective on April 1, 1910, but prior to that date, 134 proclamations, which practically included the entire commercial world, had been issued by the President applying the minimum tariff.[14] By an exchange of notes, January 21, 1911, between the Secretary of State of the United States and representatives of the Dominion of Canada, an arrangement was reached in which it was agreed that the governments of the two countries would use their utmost efforts to bring about by concurrent legislation certain tariff changes. Such legislation was duly passed by the Congress of the United States, but failed of passage in the Canadian Parliament.[15]

The special acts of August 5, 1854, March 1, 1873, August 15, 1876, and December 17, 1903, to carry into effect, respectively, the conventions for commercial reciprocity with Great Britain of June 5, 1854, and May 8, 1871 (arts. XVIII to XXV and XXX), with the Hawaiian Islands of January 30, 1875, and with Cuba of December 11, 1902, were to be effective only when the President had received satisfactory evidence that the other contracting parties had passed the necessary laws to carry the conventions into effect.[16] Formal protocols were signed June 7, 1873, and May 28, 1874, by Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, and Sir Edward Thornton, British minister, reciting the fact that the laws required to carry into effect the articles of the treaty of May 8, 1871, had been passed, and fixing the date on which the articles should take effect in respect of Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland. A protocol, containing similar recitals in respect of the operation of the Hawaiian treaty of January 30, 1875, was signed September 9, 1876.

Acts of Congress authorizing and directing the President to apply by proclamation provisions thereof, when possessed of satisfactory evidence that certain conditions have been complied with by a foreign power, are numerous. Section 1 of the act approved June 11, 1864, to give effect to treaties between the United States and foreign nations respecting consular jurisdiction over crews of the vessels of such foreign nations in the waters and ports of the United States, provided that, before the act should take effect as to the vessels of any particular nation having such treaty with the United States, the President should be satisfied that similar provisions had been made by that nation to give effect to the treaty, whereupon proclamation to that effect should be made.[17] The provisions of the act were extended by proclamation, February 10, 1870, to France, Italy, Prussia, and the other states of the North German Union,[18] and May 11, 1872, to Norway and Sweden.[19] Section 2 of the act approved August 5, 1882, as amended by section 10 of the act of February 14, 1903, provides that, whenever it is made to appear to the Secretary of Commerce that the rules concerning the measurements for tonnage of vessels of the United States have been substantially adopted by any foreign country, he may direct that the vessels of such foreign country be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of register, and that thereupon it shall be unnecessary for such vessels to be remeasured at ports of the United States.[20] Formal instruments of agreement for the mutual exemption from remeasurement of vessels of the one country in the ports of the other were executed by the Secretary of State with the Russian minister, June 6, 1884, and with the Danish minister, February 26, 1886. An agreement was reached with Sweden and Norway as to Norwegian vessels by exchange of notes in 1894.[21] Section 4400 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act approved March 17, 1906, provides for the reciprocal exemption of steamboats from inspection in case the laws of a foreign country for this purpose are similar to those of the United States.[22] An arrangement for such reciprocal exemption was effected with the Japanese Government by exchange of notes, April 3–November 30, 1906.[23] The act of Congress approved June 19, 1878, as amended by the acts approved May 24, 1890, and March 3, 1893, extended, on conditions of reciprocity to be determined by the President, to Canadian vessels privileges of access to our inland waters in aid of wrecked and disabled vessels. A proclamation of the President to give effect to the provisions of the act was made July 17, 1893.[24] The act of Congress of August 19, 1890, as amended by the acts of May 28, 1894, August 13, 1894, and June 10, 1896, to adopt the international regulations for the prevention of collisions at sea, contained the reservation that the act should take effect at a time to be fixed by proclamation of the President. Such proclamations were made July 13, 1894, and December 31, 1896.[25]

SEC. 63. International copyright: Section 13 of the Copyright Act of March 3, 1891, provided that the act should apply to a citizen or subject of a foreign state only when such state permitted to citizens of the United States the benefit of copyright on substantially the same basis as its own citizens, or was a party to an international agreement which provided for reciprocity in the granting of copyright by the terms of which the United States might at its pleasure become a party. The existence of either of these conditions was to be determined by the President.[26] Under the first alternative, the President extended the benefits of the act by proclamation to subjects of Belgium, France, Great Britain and possessions, and Switzerland, July 1, 1891; Germany, April 15, 1892;[27] Italy, October 31, 1892; Denmark, May 8, 1893; Portugal, July 20, 1893; Spain, July 10, 1895;[28] Mexico, February 27, 1896; Chile, May 25, 1896; Costa Rica, October 19, 1899; the Netherlands and possessions, November 20, 1899; Cuba, November 17, 1903; Norway, July 1, 1905; and Austria, September 20, 1907. Section 8 of the act approved March 4, 1909, to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright, provides that the benefits of the act shall extend to a citizen or subject of a foreign state only (a) when an alien author or proprietor is domiciled within the United States at the time of the first publication of his work; or (b) when the foreign state of which the author or proprietor is a citizen or subject grants, either by treaty, agreement, or law, to citizens of the United States the benefit of copyright on substantially the same basis as to its own citizens, or copyright protection substantially equal to the protection secured to such foreign author under this act or by treaty; or when such foreign state is a party to an international agreement which provides for reciprocity in the granting of copyright, by the terms of which agreement the United States may, at its pleasure, become a party. The existence of these reciprocal conditions is to be determined by the President by proclamation.[29] By proclamation dated April 9, 1910, it was declared that the subjects and citizens of Austria, Belgium, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, France, Germany, Great Britain and possessions, Italy, Mexico, the Netherlands and possessions, Norway, Portugal, Spain, and Switzerland were entitled, and had been entitled since July 1, 1909 (the date on which the act became effective), to all the benefits of the act, other than those under section I (e), in reference to the reproduction of musical compositions.[30] The benefits of the act, subject to the same exception, were extended to the subjects of the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg by proclamation dated June 29, 1910,[31] of Sweden by proclamation dated May 26, 1911, and of Tunis by proclamation dated October 4, 1912.[32]

SEC. 64. Trade-marks: The United States has entered into various formal treaty stipulations for the protection of trade-marks.[33] Section 1 of the act of February 20, 1905, provides that the owner of a trade-mark, used in interstate or foreign commerce, who is domiciled in the United States or who resides or is located in any foreign country which by treaty, convention, or law, affords similar privileges to citizens of the United States, may obtain registration for such trade-mark by complying with certain designated requirements.[34] Under similar provisions in section 1 of the act approved March 3, 1881,[35] agreements for the reciprocal registration and protection of trade-marks were effected by exchange of notes, February 10 and 16, 1893, with the Netherlands, and April 27 and May 14, 1883, with Switzerland.[36] A declaration for the reciprocal protection of trade-marks was signed July 9, 1894, with the Greek Government by Mr. Alexander, minister at Athens. The American negotiator considered the declaration as merely explanatory of rights already secured under the treaty of 1837 between the two countries. Mr. Gresham, Secretary of State, did not entertain the same view, but considered the declaration as practically a new treaty which could be ratified only with the consent of the Senate.[37] Agreements for the reciprocal protection in consular courts of trade-marks in China were effected by exchange of notes with Belgium, November 27, 1905 (explanatory note of January 22, 1906); with Denmark, March 19–June 12, 1907; with France, October 3, 1905 (explanatory note of January 22, 1906); with Germany, December 6, 1905 (explanatory note of January 22, 1906); with Great Britain, June 28, 1905; with Italy, December 18, 1905 (explanatory note of January 22, 1906); with the Netherlands, October 23, 1905 (explanatory note of January 27, 1906); and with Russia, June 28, 1906. Notes as to protection in consular courts of trade-marks in Morocco were exchanged with Germany, September 28–October 28, 1901; with Great Britain, December 1–6, 1899; and with Italy, June 13, 1903–March 12, 1904.[38] By notes exchanged June 22 and June 26, 1906, an agreement was reached with Denmark as to the protection afforded by the laws of the respective countries to industrial designs or models, in case the articles which they represent are not manufactured in the country where protection is sought.

SEC. 65. International postal and money-order regulations: By section 26 of the general act of February 20, 1792, to establish the post office and post roads, and to prescribe the rates of postage, the Postmaster General was authorized to make "arrangements with the postmasters in any foreign country for the reciprocal receipt and delivery of letters and packets, through the post offices."[39] This provision was textually reenacted in the successive general Post Office Acts of May 8, 1794,[40] March 2, 1799,[41] April 30, 1810,[42] and March 3, 1825.[43] In section 2 of the act of March 3, 1851, to reduce and modify the rates of postage, the Postmaster General was authorized by and with the advice and consent of the President "to reduce or enlarge, from time to time, the rates of postage upon all letters and other mailable matters conveyed between the United States and any foreign country, for the purpose of making better postal arrangements with other governments, or counteracting any adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with foreign countries."[44] This provision as modified and incorporated as section 167 of the General Act of June 8, 1872, to consolidate and revise the laws relating to the Post Office Department,[45] and brought forward as section 398 of the Revised Statutes reads: "For the purpose of making better postal arrangements with foreign countries, or to counteract their adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with them, the Postmaster General, by and with the advice and consent of the President, may negotiate and conclude postal treaties or conventions, and may reduce or increase the rates of postage on mail matter conveyed between the United States and foreign countries."[46] Section 103 of the act of June 8, 1872,[47] brought forward as section 4028 of the Revised Statutes, likewise authorizes the Postmaster General to conclude arrangements with the post departments of foreign governments, with which postal conventions have been concluded, for the exchange by means of postal orders, of sums of money not exceeding in amount $100,[48] at such rates of exchange and under such regulations as may be deemed expedient. In virtue of these provisions, postal and money-order conventions have been concluded by the Postmaster General with the approval of the President without submission to the Senate. Among these are the General Postal Union Convention signed at Berne, October 9, 1874, and the Universal Postal Union Conventions signed at Vienna, July 4, 1891, at Washington, June 15, 1897, and at Rome, May 26, 1906.[49] It has been held that the provision in article XXV of the regulations attached to the Berne Convention, in which it was declared that no article liable to customs duties should be admitted for conveyance by the post, was the law of the land, and that goods so imported were liable to seizure.[50] Of postal conventions submitted by the President to the Senate for its advice and consent as to the ratification, prior to the passage of the act of 1872, note may be made of those signed as follows: March 6, 1844, with New Granada; December 15, 1848, with Great Britain; July 31, 1861, and December 11, 1861, with [32] The United States is a party to the Convention on the Protection of Literary and Artistic Copyright, signed August 11, 1910, at the Fourth International American Conference. Stipulations for the protection of copyrights are found in various treaties, as, for instance, in the treaty with China of October 8, 1903 (art XI), in the Convention with Japan of November 10, 1905, in two Conventions with Japan concluded May 19, 1908, for protection of trade-marks and copyrights in Korea and China, respectively, and in the Convention with Hungary concluded January 30, 1912. The United States did not accede to the International Copyright Convention concluded at Berne, September 9, 1886. [37] Foreign Relations, 1895, pp. 759, 763, 765; Moore, Int. Law Digest, V, 196. Mr. Hay, in a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, dated November 4, 1898, said: "My predecessors, Mr. Gresham and Mr. Olney, in instructions to our Minister at Athens (Foreign Relations, 1894, pp. 293–295; and Foreign Relations, 1895, pp. 759–765), took the position that a declaration signed by the Minister and the Greek minister for foreign affairs, to the effect that the treaty of 1837 between the United States and Greece conferred upon the citizens of either country in the dominions of the other the same rights as respects trade-marks as such citizens may enjoy in their own, would not accomplish the end desired, but that a formal treaty was necessary. I think it is plain that a simple declaration would not bind this Government to grant trade-mark privileges to Mexican citizens, but in view of the Mexican law, which (the Commissioner of Patents states) allows citizens of the United States to register their trade-marks in Mexico, it would appear that Mexicans can now obtain registration of their trade-marks here, under the provisions of our law of March 3, 1881. * * * It will be observed that the provision of sec. 3 [of the act of March 3, 1881] is in the alternative; that in order to entitle a trade-mark to registration, it must appear: 1. That it is lawfully used as such by the applicant in foreign commerce, the owner being domiciled in the United States or located in a foreign country which, by treaty, convention, or by law, affords similar privileges to citizens of the United States; or 2, that such trade-mark is within the provision of a treaty, convention, or declaration with a foreign power. While registration could not be claimed by a Mexican under the second alternative, it seems to me that it could properly be claimed under the first. I think an exchange of notes with the Mexican Government would be entirely proper to establish the fact that under the Mexican law, citizens of the United States may obtain registration of their trade-marks. This was done with the Netherlands in 1883." Moore, Int. Law Digest, II, 36.

[38] The international convention for the protection of industrial property, signed at Paris, March 30, 1883, was ratified by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, March 29, 1887, and the ratification was communicated to the Swiss Government on May 30, 1887. The ratification of the additional act, signed at Brussels, December 14, 1900, was deposited at Brussels, May 3, 1901. These two conventions have been superseded by the convention signed at Washington June 2, 1911, which has been duly ratified and proclaimed on the part of the United States. The United States is also a party to the general convention for the protection of inventions, patents, designs, and industrial models, signed August 20, 1911, at the Fourth International American Conference.

SEC. 66. Agreements with Indian tribes: On July 12, 1775, three departments of Indian affairs—the northern, southern, and middle—were organized and the superintendence of each placed under commissioners.[52] By the general ordinance for the regulation of Indian affairs of August 7, 1786, two districts were organized, the superintendents of which were placed under the immediate control of the Secretary at War.[53] Treaties concluded through these agencies do not appear to have been formally ratified.[54] In the act of August 7, 1789, for the organization of the War Department under the Constitution, the conduct of Indian affairs was recognized as belonging to the Secretary of War. Later it was transferred to the Department of the Interior.[55] The Senate, in approving an Indian treaty submitted for its "consideration and advice" by President Washington, May 25, 1789—the first to be submitted under the Constitution—simply advised the President "to execute and enjoin an observance." The President, in a message of September 17, requested information as to the meaning of the action of the Senate and suggested a ratification as in case of other treaties. The committee appointed by the Senate to examine the question reported against a formal ratification; but the Senate complied with the suggestion of the President by voting, September 22, to advise and consent to the ratification.[56] This procedure was followed until 1871, during which period treaties with Indian tribes were far more numerous than those with foreign powers. In the Indian Appropriations Act of March 3, 1871, it was enacted that thereafter no Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States should be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power with which the United States might contract by treaty, but that the obligation of existing treaties was in no way to be impaired or invalidated by the act.[57] No formal treaties with the Indian tribes have since been made, but agreements with them have been laid before Congress for its approval.[58] "Since the act of March 3, 1871, the Indian tribes have ceased to be treaty-making powers and have become simply the wards of the Nation. As such, Congress speaks for them and has become the legislative exponent of both guardian and ward."[59]

The peculiar status of the Indian tribes within the United States was defined in 1831 by Chief Justice Marshall, with his usual felicity of expression, as follows: "It may well be doubted whether those tribes which reside within the acknowledged boundaries of the United States can, with strict accuracy, be denominated foreign nations. They may, more correctly, perhaps, be denominated domestic dependent nations. They occupy a territory to which we assert a title independent of their will, which must take effect in point of possession when their right of possession ceases. Meanwhile they are in a state of pupilage. Their relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to his guardian."[60] Mr. Justice Gray, at a later date, said: "The Indian tribes within the limits of the United States are not foreign nations; though distinct political communities, they are in a dependent condition; and Chief Justice Marshall's description, that 'they are in a state of pupilage,' and 'their relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to his guardian' has become more and more appropriate as they have grown less powerful and more dependent."[61]

SEC. 67. Acquisition of territory: Although the important acquisitions of 1803, 1819, 1848, 1853, 1867, and 1898 were made by formal treaty, territory has under special circumstances been acquired by virtue of an act of Congress. A treaty was signed at Washington, April 12, 1844, with the Republic of Texas, by which that republic agreed to convey and transfer to the United States all its rights of separate and independent sovereignty and jurisdiction. On June 8, 1844, the treaty was rejected by the Senate by a vote of 35 to 16.[62] In resolution, submitted by Mr. Benton, May 13, 1844, it was declared that the ratification of the treaty would be the adoption of the Texan War; that the treaty-making power of the President and Senate did not include the power of making war, either by declaration or by adoption; and that the territory disencumbered from the United States by the treaty of 1819 ought to be united to the American Union as soon as this could be accomplished with the consent of a majority of the people of the United States and of Texas, and when Mexico should either consent to the transfer or acknowledge the independence of Texas, or cease to wage war against her on a scale commensurate with the conquest of the country.[63] The opinion was frequently expressed that the ratification of the treaty would be the adoption of a war with Mexico, and accordingly not within the province of the treaty-making power. To an enquiry made by the Senate whether any military preparations had been made in anticipation of war, and, if so, for what cause and with whom was war apprehended, President Tyler, in a message of May 15, 1844, replied that, in consequence of an announcement of Mexico of its determination to regard as a declaration of war the definitive ratification of the treaty of annexation, a portion of the naval and military forces of the United States had as a precautionary measure been assembled in the region of Texas. He observed further that the United States having by the treaty of annexation acquired a title to Texas, which required only the action of the Senate to perfect it, no other power could invade and by force of arms possess itself of any portion of the territory of Texas, pending the deliberations of the Senate on the treaty, without placing itself in a hostile attitude to the United States.[64] Immediately preceding the rejection of the treaty, a resolution was introduced by Mr. Henderson declaring that the annexation would be properly achieved on the part of the United States by an act of Congress admitting the people of Texas with defined boundaries as a new State into the Union on an equal footing with the other States.[65] This course was followed, and on March 1, 1845, a joint resolution was approved consenting to the erection of the territory rightfully belonging to the Republic of Texas into a new State. A proviso, attached in the Senate through the efforts of Mr. Benton, gave the President an opportunity, before communicating the resolution to Texas, to resort to negotiations upon terms of admission and cession either by treaty to be submitted to the Senate or by articles to be submitted to both Houses.[66] The purpose of the proviso was to effect if possible the acquisition, and at the same time maintain peaceful relations with Mexico.[67] Negotiations were not resorted to;[68] and Texas, having accepted and complied

[68] Mr. Calhoun, Secretary of State, in communicating a copy of the joint resolution to Mr. Donelson, chargé d'affaires to Texas, March 3, 1845, said: "The President has deliberately considered the subject, and is of opinion that it would not be desirable to enter into the negotiations authorized by the amendment of the Senate; and you are accordingly instructed to present to the Government of Texas, as the basis of its admission, the proposals contained in the resolution as it came from the House of Representatives. * * * But the decisive objection to the amendment of the Senate is, that it would endanger the ultimate success of the measure. It proposes to fix, by negotiation between the Governments of the United States and Texas, the terms and conditions on which the State shall be admitted into our Union, and the cession of the remaining territory to the United States. Now, by whatever name the agents conducting the negotiation may be known * * * the compact agreed on by them in behalf of their respective Governments would be a treaty; whether so-called or designated by some other name. * * * And if a treaty (as it clearly would be) it must be submitted to the Senate for its approval and run the hazard of receiving the votes of two-thirds of the Members present, which could hardly be expected, if we are to judge from recent experience. This, of itself, is considered by the President as a conclusive reason for proposing the resolution of the House, instead of the amendment of the Senate, as the basis of annexation" (mss. inst. to Texas, I, 107). Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, in instructions to Mr. Donelson, dated March 10, 1845, stated that, while the new President did not concur in the opinion of his predecessor that terms of admission agreed upon under the proviso would necessarily be a treaty which must be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent, he had decided not to reverse the decision of his predecessor (Works of James Buchanan, Moore ed., VI, 120).

with the conditions of the resolution,[69] was admitted by a joint resolution approved December 29, 1845, as a State into the Union.[70]

A treaty for the incorporation of the Dominican Republic, signed November 29, 1869, was rejected by the Senate on June 30, 1870. President Grant in his annual message of December 5, 1870, urged upon Congress early action expressive of its views as to the best means of making the acquisition, and suggested that this might be accomplished either by the action of the Senate on a treaty, or by the joint action of the two Houses of Congress on a resolution of annexation as in the case of the acquisition of Texas.[71]

A treaty was signed at Washington, June 16, 1897, with the Republic of Hawaii for the annexation of that republic to the United States. The treaty was ratified by the Hawaiian Legislature, but the cession was accepted and confirmed on the part of the United States by a joint resolution approved July 7, 1898.[72] Although, as a matter of fact, the resolution was agreed to in the Senate, July 6, by a two-thirds vote,[73] the annexation was effected by an act of the legislative, not the treaty-making, power. In 1845, a foreign state was by an act of Congress incorporated and admitted as a State into the Union; in 1898, a foreign state was by an act of Congress brought within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. In each case, however, the other contracting party by the very agreement lost its identity as a separate nation with which international relations could thereafter exist, and the agreement by which the incorporation was effected ceased thereupon to be an international compact.[74]

In defining the relations which should exist between the United States and Cuba, article VII of the act of Congress, approved March 2, 1901, provided that, to enable the United States to maintain the independence of Cuba and to protect the people thereof, as well as for its own defense, the Cuban Government would sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling and naval stations at points to be agreed upon with the President of the United States. This same provision was adopted by Cuba as article VII of the appendix to its constitution. By virtue thereof an agreement was signed, by the President of Cuba, February 16, 1903, and by the President of the United States, February 23, 1903, for the lease to the United States, subject to terms to be agreed upon by the two governments, of lands at Guantanamo and Bahia Honda for coaling and naval stations. Neither this agreement nor the protocol of July 2, 1903, prescribing the conditions of the lease, and in which the United States agreed to pay to Cuba annually, as long as it should occupy the designated areas, the sum of $2,000 in gold, was submitted to the Senate, although the latter agreement was formally approved by the President and the ratifications exchanged.[75]

The act of Congress of August 18, 1856, brought forward as sections 5570–5578 of the Revised Statutes, provides that, whenever any citizen of the United States discovers a deposit of guano on any island, rock, or key, not within the lawful jurisdiction of any other government and not occupied by the citizens of any other government, and takes peaceable possession thereof and occupies the same, such island or key may at the discretion of the President be considered as appertaining to the United States. Under the provisions of this act numerous guano islands have been announced as appertaining to the United States.[76]

If the procedural barriers to an attack on the Trade Agreements Act are successfully negotiated, there remains the more basic issue of its validity. The act contemplates the exercise of two governmental powers: that of making international agreements other than treaties, and that of reducing tariffs. Although authority to enter into international agreements less formal than treaties is nowhere expressly granted in the Constitution, it is concededly part of the power to control foreign affairs which is vested in the Federal Government; [1] under American practice, such agreements have traditionally been made by the executive rather than the legislative branch of the Government.[2] On the other hand, tariff making has always been considered a function of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, as part of the power given it in the Constitution to levy duties [3] and control foreign commerce.[4] It is probable that Congress could not constitutionally enter into agreements with foreign nations,[5] and it is possible that the Executive could not, without statutory authority, make an effective trade agreement regulating tariffs, since such an agreement might not have the status of a treaty,[6] and the existing tariff legislation might therefore remain the law of the land.[7] The technique of the Trade

The commissioners on the part of the United States, James Madison, Albert Gallatin, and Levi Lincoln, were appointed by President Adams under an act of Congress, approved April 7, 1798. An act of May 10, 1800, vested final powers in the commissioners. On the part of Georgia the agreement was ratified and confirmed by the legislature, June 16, 1802. H. Mis. Doc. Such agreements are at all stages, during their negotiation, as well as after their conclusion, entirely an internal affair. During the northeastern boundary negotiations in 1832, an agreement with the State of Maine for the cession to the Government of the United States of the territory under dispute, and claimed by that State, east of the St. Francis River and north of the St. John, was signed. The agreement was never consummated; but in the fifth article of the Webster-Ashburton treaty a clause was inserted, by which the Government of the United States agreed "with the States of Maine and Massachusetts to pay them the further sum of $300,000, in equal moieties, on account of their assent to the line of boundary described in this treaty, and in consideration of the conditions and equivalents received therefor from the Government of Her Britannic Majesty." The irregularity of incorporating into an international treaty a stipulation of this character was not overlooked by the British negotiator. On signing the treaty, Lord Ashburton addressed a note to Mr. Webster, in which he stated that the introduction of an agreement between the Central and State governments would have been "irregular and inadmissible, if it had not been deemed expedient to bring the whole of these transactions within the purview of the treaty." He requested an assurance that his Government should incur no responsibility for these engagements. To this Mr. Webster replied on the same date: "It purports to contain no stipulation on the part of Great Britain, nor is any responsibility supposed to be incurred by it on the part of your Government." See Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement (2d ed. 1916), 1; Anderson, The Extent and Limitations of the Treaty-Making Power Under the Constitution (1907) (1 Am. J. Int. L. 636). It has been said that the United States is a sovereign member of the family of nations and therefore vested with this power. See Holmes v. Jennison (14 Pt. 540, 568–570 (U. It has also been stated that the power is derived as well from the Constitution, either expressly or by implication. See Moore, The Control of the Foreign Relations of the United States, 1921, p. 3, in Reprints and Pamphlets, Yale Law Library. Support for this view can be found in the affirmative grants of authority to branches of the Federal Government to make treaties and appoint Ambassadors [U. S. Const., art. II, sec. 2, cl. 2], to regulate commerce with foreign nations [id., art. I, sec. 8, cl. 3], to punish violations of international law [id., cl. 10], and to declare war [id., cl. 11], and the denial to the States of power to enter into treaties, alliances, confederations [id., sec. 10, cl. 1], or (without the consent of Congress) into compacts or agreements [id., cl. 3].

For a discussion, see Lenoir, Treaties and the Supreme Court (1934) (1 U. of Chi. L. Rev. 602, 608–609).

It has even been suggested that a subsequent treaty might not supersede tariff legislation. See Anderson, supra note 76, at 650–653.

Agreements Act seemed a practical way to obtain international agreements regulating tariff rates; it resolves the division of authority between Congress and the Executive by having Congress delegate its tariff-making powers to the President who is capable of negotiating with foreign nations.[8] Upon the validity of this delegation rests the constitutionality of the act.[9]

The criterion by which the courts purport to determine whether a particular delegation of legislative power can be reconciled with the principle of separation of powers [10] is whether Congress has established sufficiently definite standards to guide the exercise of the power.[11] Until 1935, the Supreme Court had in no case held an act of Congress delegating power to the Executive invalid under this test.[12] Various vague standards, such "public interest," [13] "undesirable residents," [14] "educational, moral, amusing, or harmless," [15] "purity, quality, and fitness for consumption," [16] "safe, pure, and affording a satisfactory light," [17] and even "reasonable" [18] were held to furnish a sufficient guide for the exercise of the power.[19] A delegation of tariff-making power, quite similar to that of the Trade Agreements Act, was upheld in J. W. Hampton, Jr. & Co. v. United States,[20] in which the flexible-tariff provisions of the Tariff Act of 1922 [21] were attacked. By that act, the President was authorized to increase or decrease by 50 percent the import duty on any commodity in order to equalize the difference between the costs of production abroad and in the United States. The Supreme Court held that, although it may be difficult to determine such differences in cost, Congress' objective was clear enough, and that consequently a satisfactory criterion for executive action was provided. But in two cases decided in 1935—Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan [22] and Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States [23]—the Supreme Court invalidated the National Industrial Recovery Act,[24] holding that the delegation of legislative power to the President was defective because the general standards of policy set up by Congress were so broad that they provided no limitation on the executive authority, but rather gave "a roving commission to inquire into evils, and upon discovery, correct them." [25]

Despite their emphasis on the need for careful standards to restrict administrative action, the cases have made it clear that the standards which Congress must establish in order to satisfy constitutional proprieties are defined with reference to the factual setting in which the particular administrative activity is undertaken. The operation of this principle is strikingly illustrated by the recent Supreme Court decision in United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation.[26] That case involved the validity of a Congressional resolution [27] delegating to the President the power to impose an embargo on the shipment of arms and munitions to belligerent nations. Although the only standard set up to guide the President in determining when he should forbid such exports was the requirement that he find that the embargo "may contribute to the reestablishment of peace," the Supreme Court, with Mr. Justice McReynolds dissenting, held the delegation constitutional. The Court did not decide whether this standard would have been adequate to support a delegation of power over internal matters, but stated that an unusually large degree of discretion could constitutionally be granted to the President in the exercise of an authority which would inevitably have an effect on, and involve participation in, foreign affairs. Two somewhat interrelated propositions are discernible as the grounds for this conclusion.

The first is that as a matter of practical efficiency, the President must be given a relatively free hand in dealing with problems affecting foreign relations. His special knowledge of affairs abroad, the necessity that he be unembarrassed and free to act quickly, and the need for secrecy in the conduct of international negotiations are all considerations requiring that his action in this field be as free as possible. This view that practical necessities help to define the constitutional restrictions on the exercise of a particular delegated power is apparent not only in cases concerning foreign relations,[28] but also where internal matters of some complexity, detail, or technicality have been involved.[29]

But the Supreme Court advanced another proposition, apparently novel in the literature relating to delegation of power, to explain why an unusual degree of discretion could constitutionally be given to the Executive under the embargo resolution.[30] The Court emphasized that it was "dealing not alone with an authority vested in the President by an exertion of legislative power, but with such an authority plus the very delicate, plenary, and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the Federal Government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress, * * *" This statement seems to indicate that where the executive is entrusted with legislative authority to be exercised in conjunction with and in aid of one of his own sovereign, or perhaps constitutional duties, in this case his authority as agent of the Nation in foreign affairs, constitutional requirements of definiteness in delegation will be satisfied by a general indication from the legislature as to how it wishes the delegated power to be used.

Finally, the Court buttressed its conclusion by referring to the lengthy history of comparable legislation, a factor which, while not controlling, is a strong indication of constitutionality not to be disregarded in the absence of a clear usurpation of power.[31]

[8] But cf. Moore, supra note 76, at 3: "In regard to * * * 'congressional delegation of power to make international agreements,' I have * * * always, been inclined to think that no 'delegation' of power whatever is involved in the matter. As Congress possesses no power whatever to make international agreements, it has no such power to delegate. All that Congress has done in the cases referred to is to exercise beforehand that part of the function belonging to it in the carrying out of a particular class of international agreements. Instead of waiting to legislate until an agreement has been concluded and then acting on the agreement specifically, Congress has merely adopted in advance general legislation under which agreements, falling within its terms, become effective immediately on their conclusion or their proclamation."

[9] It has been argued that the matters covered by the agreements can properly be dealt with only by treaty; and that the agreements cannot be sustained as treaties, because the Senate's power of ratification, if delegable at all, is not properly delegated in the Trade Agreements Act. See Comment (1936) (24 Geo. L. J. 717, 718). But it seems probable that tariff reciprocity may be accomplished by executive agreements, at least if made pursuant to statute, as well as by treaties. Cf. Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649 (1892)); Corwin, op. cit. supra note 77, at 117, 120–125. And see note 110, infra.

[10] The doctrine of separation of powers is not affirmatively asserted in the Constitution, but is derived from art. I, sec. 1, and art. I, sec. 8, clause 18, giving legislative power to Congress. In the perspective of past decisions, there can be little doubt as to the validity of the Trade Agreements Act. Although its stated aims of restoring the standard of living, increasing employment, and combating the depression are reminiscent of the vague standards set up in the National Industrial Recovery Act, it contains in addition more detailed limitations, similar to those which were approved in the Hampton case, such as the provisions that existing rates of duty cannot be changed by more than 50 percent, and that transfers from the free and dutiable lists are prohibited; and the President must find quite specifically that existing duties of the United States or of a foreign nation are unduly burdening the foreign trade of the United States, which appears to be as adequate a limitation as that approved in the Hampton case, where a finding was required that existing duties do not equalize the production cost of the domestic article and of the like foreign article. Furthermore, the executive is limited to the performance of one type of action—modification of tariff duties. "He is not left to roam at will among all the possible subjects of" foreign commerce.[22]

[From Van Der Weyde v. Ocean Transport Co., Ltd., et al., 297 U. S. 114, at p. 115]

OPINION OF THE COURT

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the Court.

Petitioner brought this libel in 1931 in the District Court for the Western District of Washington, against the vessel Taigen Maru, for personal injuries which he sustained as a seaman in 1922. The vessel was then known as the Luise Nielsen and was of Norwegian registry. The respondent, Ocean Transport Co., Ltd., a Japanese corporation, made claim as owner, and filed exceptions alleging that a final decree had been entered in the District Court for the District of Oregon in 1924, dismissing a libel, for the same cause, on the intervention of the Norwegian consul.

In the present case, there was again an intervention by the Norwegian consul, who claimed that, while the vessel was now Japanese, he was nevertheless officially concerned, as the former Norwegian owner had agreed to deliver the vessel "free from all debts and encumbrances." The consul filed exceptive allegations to the effect that the libelant, a Dutch subject, had signed Norwegian articles and, so far as his rights as a seaman were concerned, was bound by the laws of Norway, which provided for appropriate remedies. The consul asked that, if the cause was not dismissed because of the former decree, the dispute should be left for his adjustment and disposition. The libelant made response and, on hearing, the district court dismissed the cause "in the exercise of its discretion."

The circuit court of appeals affirmed the decree, but upon the ground that the dismissal should have been for want of jurisdiction rather than as an exercise of discretion (73 F. (2d) 922). The court based its decision upon the second paragraph of article XIII of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, of 1827, between the United States and the Kingdom of Sweden and Norway, the text of which is given in the margin.[1] The court assumed that this provision was still in effect, apparently not being advised of the fact that articles XIII and XIV of that treaty had been terminated in 1919. See Foreign Relations of the United States, 1919, pages 47–54.

Section 16 of the Seamen's Act of March 4, 1915,[2] expressed "the judgment of Congress" that treaty provisions in conflict with the provisions of the act "ought to be terminated," and the President was "requested and directed" to give notice to that effect to the several governments concerned within 90 days after the passage of the act. It appears that, in consequence, notice was given and that a large number of treaties were terminated in whole or in part.[3] The treaty with Sweden and Norway of 1827 provided that it might be terminated, after an initial period of 10 years, upon 1 year's notice.[4] On February 2, 1918, the Government gave notice to the Norwegian Government of the denunciation of the treaty in its entirely, to take effect on February 2, 1919, but later by an exchange of diplomatic notes, this Government formally withdrew its denunciation, except as to articles XIII and XIV. Foreign Relations of the United States, 1919, pp. 50–52.) It was expressly stated that articles XIII and XIV of the treaty, being in conflict with provisions of the Seamen's Act, were deemed to be terminated on July 1, 1916, so far as the laws of the United States were concerned (Id. pp. 53, 54.)

On June 5, 1928, the two governments signed a treaty of friendship, commerce, and consular rights, and on February 25, 1929, an additional article, which supplanted the treaty of 1827 (so far as the latter had remained effective), save that article I of the former treaty concerning the entry and residence of the nationals of the one country in the territories of the other for the purposes of trade, was continued in force.[5]

Respondent contends (1) that the Seamen's Act did not specifically direct the abrogation of article XIII, (2) that the act was not so unavoidably inconsistent with all the provisions of article XIII as to require its entire abrogation, and (3) that the diplomatic negotiations attempting to effect abrogation of the whole of article XIII "were in excess of congressional direction and in violation of constitutional authority."

The first and second points are unavailing, if article XIII was actually abrogated in its entirety, and that this was the purport of the diplomatic exchanges between the two governments is beyond dispute. As to the third point, we think that the question as to the authority of the Executive in the absence of congressional action, or of action by the treaty-making power, to denounce a treaty of the United States, is not here involved. In this instance the Congress requested and directed the President to give notice of the termination of the treaty provisions in conflict with the act. From every point of view, it was incumbent upon the President, charged with the conduct of negotiations with foreign governments and also with the duty to take care that the laws of the United States are faithfully executed, to reach a conclusion as to the inconsistency between the provisions of the treaty and the provisions of the new law. It is not possible to say that his conclusion as to articles XIII and XIV was arbitrary or inadmissible. Having determined that their termination was necessary, the President, through the Secretary of State, took appropriate steps to effect it. Norway agreed to the termination of articles XIII and XIV and her consul cannot be heard to question it.

The injuries, of which libelant complains, took place after that termination. The effect of the new treaty we need not, and do not, consider, as in any event it could not be regarded as retroactively affecting the jurisdiction of the district court.

The circuit court of appeals fell into error in sustaining the dismissal of the cause upon the ground of want of jurisdiction by reason of the treaty provision invoked. We express no opinion upon any other questions which the cause may present, as these have not been considered by the courts below. They should be considered and determined.

The decree is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Reversed.

]From United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation et al., 299 U. S. 304, at p. 319[

Not only, as we have shown, is the Federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate, and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the Nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it. As Marshall said in his great argument of March 7, 1800, in the House of Representatives, "The President is the sole organ of the Nation in its external relations and its sole representative with foreign nations." (Annals, 6th Cong., col. 613.) The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, at a very early day in our history (February 15, 1816), reported to the Senate, among other things, as follows:

"The President is the constitutional representative of the United States with regard to foreign nations. He manages our concerns with foreign nations and must necessarily be most competent to determine when, how, and upon what subjects negotiation may be urged with the greatest prospect of success. For his conduct he is responsible to the Constitution. The committee consider this responsibility the surest pledge for the faithful discharge of his duty. They think the interference of the Senate in the direction of foreign negotiations calculated to diminish that responsibility and thereby to impair the best security for the national safety. The nature of transactions with foreign nations, moreover, requires caution and unity of design, and their success frequently depends on secrecy and dispatch." (U. S. Senate, Reports, Committee on Foreign Relations, vol. 8, p. 24.)

It is important to bear in mind that we are here dealing not alone with an authority vested in the President by an exertion of legislative power, but with such an authority plus the very delicate, plenary, and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the Federal Government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress but which, of course, like every other governmental power, must be exercised in subordination to the applicable provisions of the Constitution. It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved. Moreover, he, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries, and especially is this true in time of war. He has his confidential sources of information. He has his agents in the form of diplomatic, consular, and other officials. Secrecy in respect of information gathered by them may be highly necessary, and the premature disclosure of it productive of harmful results. Indeed, so clearly is this true that the first President refused to accede to a request to lay before the House of Representatives the instructions, correspondence, and documents relating to the negotiation of the Jay treaty—a refusal the wisdom of which was recognized by the House itself and has never since been doubted. In his reply to the request, President Washington said:

"The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and even when brought to a conclusion a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions which may have been proposed or contemplated would be extremely impolitic; for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences, perhaps danger and mischief, in relation to other powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principle on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of members. To admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand and to have as a matter of course all the papers respecting a negotiation with a foreign power would be to establish a dangerous precedent" (1 Messages and Papers of the President, p. 194).

The marked difference between foreign affairs and domestic affairs in this respect is recognized by both Houses of Congress in the very form of their requisitions for information from the executive departments. In the case of every department except the Department of State, the resolution directs the official to furnish the information. In the case of the State Department, dealing with foreign affairs, the President is requested to furnish the information "if not incompatible with the public interest." A statement that to furnish the information is not compatible with the public interest rarely, if ever, is questioned.

When the President is to be authorized by legislation to act in respect of a matter intended to affect a situation in foreign territory, the legislator properly bears in mind the important consideration that the form of the President's action—or, indeed, whether he shall act at all—may well depend, among other things, upon the nature of the confidential information which he has or may thereafter receive, or upon the effect which his action may have upon our foreign relations. This consideration, in connection with what we have already said on the subject, discloses the unwisdom of requiring Congress in this field of governmental power to lay down narrowly definite standards by which the President is to be governed. As this court said in Mackenzie v. Hare (239 U. S. 299, 311), "As a Government the United States is invested with all the attributes of sovereignty. As it has the character of nationality it has the powers of nationality, especially those which concern its relations and intercourse with other countries. We should hesitate long before limiting or embarrassing such powers."

In the light of the foregoing observations, it is evident that this Court should not be in haste to apply a general rule which will have the effect of condemning legislation like that under review as constituting an unlawful delegation of legislative power. The principles which justify such legislation find overwhelming support in the unbroken legislative practice which has prevailed almost from the inception of the National Government to the present day.

[From United States v. Belmont et al., Executors, 301 U. S. 324, at p. 330]

We take judicial notice of the fact that coincident with the assignment set forth in the complaint, the President recognized the Soviet Government, and normal diplomatic relations were established between that government and the Government of the United States, followed by an exchange of ambassadors. The effect of this was to validate, so far as this country is concerned, all acts of the Soviet Government here involved from the commencement of its existence. The recognition, establishment of diplomatic relations, the assignment, and agreements with respect thereto, were all parts of one transaction, resulting in an international compact between the two governments. That the negotiations, acceptance of the assignment and agreements and understandings in respect thereof were within the competence of the President may not be doubted. Governmental power over internal affairs is distributed between the National Government and the several States. Governmental power over external affairs is not distributed, but is vested exclusively in the National Government. And in respect of what was done here, the Executive had authority to speak as the sole organ of that Government. The assignment and the agreements in connection therewith did not, as in the case of treaties, as that term is used in the treaty-making clause of the Constitution (art. II, sec. 2), require the advice and consent of the Senate.

A treaty signifies "a compact made between two or more independent nations with a view to the public welfare." (Altman & Co. v. United States, 224 U. S. 583, 600.) But an international compact, as this was, is not always a treaty which requires the participation of the Senate. There are many such compacts, of which a protocol, a modus vivendi, a postal convention, and agreements like that now under consideration are illustrations. See 5 Moore, International Law Digest, 201–221. The distinction was pointed out by this court in the Altman case, supra, which arose under section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897, authorizing the President to conclude commercial agreements with foreign countries in certain specified matters. We held that although this might not be a treaty requiring ratification by the Senate, it was a compact negotiated and proclaimed under the authority of the President, and as such was a "treaty" within the meaning of the Circuit Court of Appeals Act, the construction of which might be reviewed upon direct appeal to this court.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in the spring of 1934 the Congress passed what is known as the Trade Agreements Act, under the provisions of which the President was given power, after he had found the facts, to lower by 50 percent or raise by 50 percent the tariff rates existing between foreign nations and the United States, or such of them as he made agreements with. Under the terms of the act it was to expire in 3 years, and subsequently it was extended for an additional 3 years. The expiration of the act comes on June 12 next; and the purpose of the pending joint resolution is to continue the act in force for a further period of 3 years.

The purpose of the Trade Agreements Act, as we all know, is to promote foreign trade. Under it the President is permitted to make trade agreements for a period not exceeding 3 years. When the act was passed the so-called Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was in force, as it is still in force except as it has been modified by the trade agreements. That act was perhaps the highest tariff act this country ever knew. The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act merely provides that after such facts are found as are stated in the act the President has a right to make these agreements, lowering or raising the tariff rates in accordance with the agreements within the limitations of 50 percent up or 50 percent down.

It will be remembered that the Democratic Party did not start this system of dealing with the tariff. It was started by our Republican friends. I believe the first time it was done a defect was found in the act, which defect was that no fact-finding body was designated, and as a result the original provision was declared unconstitutional.

In 1922 the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act was passed, and in that act reciprocal-trade agreements were provided for. The provision was challenged in the courts; but the court held that the enactment was a valid one and that tariff changes could be made after a fact-finding body had passed upon the matter.

That was the situation when the present administration came into power; and in 1934 the present act was passed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The Fordney-McCumber Act did not provide for international trade agreements. Power was simply vested in the President to raise or lower tariff rates under certain conditions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under certain conditions. The authority was similar to, but not exactly like, this authority. Neither was the provision in the Smoot-Hawley Act, which was passed in 1930, exactly like this provision; but in principle it was substantially the same as this one, and the principle has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States and all our courts.

Mr. WALSH. The provision was similar to the extent that it was delegating so-called legislative power to the President.

Mr. McKELLAR. It delegated exactly the same legislative authority either to the President or to a Tariff Board.

Now, Mr. President, it is proposed to extend for 3 years, this act, admittedly constitutional, expressly so under the Constitution in the first place, and declared so by our Supreme Court, which is the last authority. Certainly it is constitutional.

Now, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has offered an amendment which I shall read:

At the end of the joint resolution insert the following new section:

"SEC. 2. Effective on the date of enactment of this act, section 2 of such act of June 12, 1934, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(d) No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 1 of this act shall take effect until the Senate of the United States shall have advised and consented to its ratification, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring.'"

The purpose of this amendment, as I understand it, is twofold:

First. It is to declare that trade agreements entered into under this law shall hereafter be regarded as treaties, which can become operative only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Second. That hereafter, in dealing with the subject of trade agreements, they will by law be designated as treaties, and made only by the President and the Senate, leaving out entirely the House of Representatives.

The first question raised as to the pending bill is that the agreements made under it are treaties, and that they are unconstitutional and invalid unless the Senate ratifies them. The distinguished Senator from Nevada very vigorously, earnestly, and ably presented this view. To my mind, his argument that such trade agreements are treaties is not sound. Trade agreements have never been considered treaties during the history of our Republic. Over 1,000 of them have been made by the President under authority of laws passed by Congress, and all such laws and agreements have been held valid and binding.

Not only that, but there are two distinct provisions of the Constitution which clearly and unmistakably make a distinction between trade agreements and treaties. The first provision is found in section 8 of article I of the Constitution, and in part reads as follows:

The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

The power in the Congress to regulate commerce is full, ample, and inclusive. We have used this power from the first session of Congress in 1789 down to this good hour. It usually takes the form of tariff bills. In these bills the Congress fixes the rates of duty on articles imported into this country. Until comparatively recent years these rates of duty were fixed and determined by the Congress itself, and no authority or power was given the Executive or other person to change them. The Tariff Act itself was the only way in which the Congress undertook to "regulate" commerce with foreign nations. Then came the school of thought that the Congress, having full power to act in the circumstances, might give the President or a tariff board power to raise or decrease tariff duties so as better to regulate them.

My recollection is that the first act was declared unconstitutional because it did not require the President or a tariff board to find the facts before changing the duty; and then, as I have stated, a bill was passed by which the President was empowered to find the facts and then change the duty within certain limits; and this act was held constitutional by our Supreme Court.

There cannot be the slightest question that under the present act the President, who is given power to change the duties upward or downward 50 percent, must first find the facts and then make the agreement changing the duties. How can such a provision be considered unconstitutional? Express power is given to the Congress by the Constitution to pass acts to regulate commerce with foreign countries. The Supreme Court has held that the Congress may go a step further, and give the President or a tariff board the right to raise or lower the duties within the limit of 50 percent.

As I understand the argument of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and other learned Senators who have spoken on that side, it is that the present act is unconstitutional because a trade agreement is a treaty. The answer to that argument, of course, is that laws have been passed from time to time in our history directing the President to make such agreements, and more than one thousand of them have been made as above stated, and that by a uniform legislative course such agreements are held to be agreements in regulation of commerce with foreign nations, and not treaties with foreign nations.

A further answer is that in the same sentence of the same article and section of the Constitution, the Congress is given authority to deal with commerce between the States; and our uniform practice during the entire history of the Government has been to deal with domestic commerce in the same manner that we deal with foreign commerce. The uniform practice for many years in dealing with commerce between the States has been not for Congress to make the rates, but for Congress to authorize an interstate commerce commission, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, to make these rates and put them in effect. Of course, that service could have been performed by the Executive; but in the wisdom of Congress it has seen fit to give that almost absolute power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the plan has been held constitutional and has worked well.

The same course, however, has not been pursued with respect to our foreign commerce; for inasmuch as the President conducts all of our relations with foreign countries, the Congress has seen fit, in its discretion, to give to the President power to regulate foreign commerce under the conditions laid down in the Act of Congress.

Able Senators, Senators in whose ability I have the greatest confidence, learned Senators, including my distinguished friend from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], who has just taken his seat—and there is no man in the Senate whom I admire more than I do the Senator from Colorado—have argued that the Trade Agreements Act is unconstitutional. I do not agree at all with those Senators. But what about the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]? The Senator from Nevada is a long-time friend of mine. Usually, I am on the same side with him. I am devoted to him. I am a great admirer of his ability, and in every other way I admire him; but is his amendment constitutional? I propose to show that the Senator's amendment is unconstitutional, and I shall first take up that subject. I think I have already demonstrated that the main measure, extending the Trade Agreements Act, is constitutional.

The amendment of the Senator from Nevada provides, in effect, that trade agreements—think of it for a moment—are not the ordinary commercial agreements which come under article I of our Constitution, providing for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, but that they are treaties; and, being treaties, that these agreements must be made by the President and ratified by the Senate of the United States, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring. Well, what becomes of the House in this shuffle?

Let me read, just a moment, as to the rights of the House of Representatives. Article I, section 8, of the Constitution in part provides as follows:

Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

The amendment of the Senator from Nevada provides, indirectly, that trade agreements shall be considered as treaties, and that they must be ratified by the Senate; in other words the Senate and the President hereafter would make all trade agreements. Under the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred, the House and the Senate have the power now to do what? To pass tariff bills? Oh, no. To regulate commerce with foreign nations; and it has been held from the beginning of the history of this Government, for over 150 years, that these agreements are not treaties. They have been put on a different plane. As I have stated, more than a thousand of them have been made in our history. They never have been made as treaties. They have always been made as trade agreements, not reaching the dignity of treaties. The House of Representatives has participated.

The House participated in the passage of the law we are now considering extending. The House has power, in part, to regulate commerce with foreign nations. If the amendment of the Senator from Nevada should be enacted, the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred would be nugatory. The House hereafter would not have anything to do with making trade agreements. The House would have nothing to do with the passage of laws regulating commerce with foreign nations. It would deprive the House of its express constitutional authority and impose that duty on the President and the Senate.

It is not a question of whether the House is willing or unwilling to have that done. It is a question of whether we are to stand by the Constitution of the United States. Why should the Senate and the President arrogate to themselves alone a power which is expressly given to them jointly with another body?

The Supreme Court has upheld this particular way of regulating commerce.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is showing a great deal of concern for the House of Representatives.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I am showing a great deal of concern for the Constitution of the United States. I have held up my hand four times now and sworn before Almighty God that as a Senator of the United States I would uphold and defend and protect the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not doubt that the Senator will do so to the best of his knowledge and ability. So far as the House is concerned, in the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897 the House of Representatives, in initiating the trade agreements, as they did at that time—it was before we had Presidents initiating them—provided in section 4 for the negotiation and adoption of reciprocity treaties, just as we are now providing. What did they provide in the act? They realized then that they could not by an act dispose of the constitutional functions of the Senate, and they wanted to preserve the rights of the House; so in the bill which they passed they provided that this kind of treaties, reciprocity treaties, should first be ratified by the Senate by a two-thirds vote, and thereafter be ratified by the Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am frank to tell the Senator that I do not think that arrangement was in accordance with the Constitution at all, and I doubt whether the Senator believes it was.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think it was. I think that the House of Representatives, when delegating authority, can put any limitations on the delegation they desire; but I do not think the House of Representatives, if they see fit to delegate all of their functions, can by the same act in which they do so take away the functions of the Senate. What they tried to do in this matter was to indicate that they were willing to delegate legislative authority to the President, and at the same time they wanted to say in the act, "And we will not bother you with the constitutional provision as to ratification by the Senate." They may delegate their authority legally, but they cannot in an act provide that if the Constitution requires ratification the agreement provided for does not have to be ratified.

Let me ask the Senator a question and I will not bother him again. There seems to be a kind of mystery as to what the word "treaty" means. Of course, I know the Senator knows. A treaty is an agreement, is it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but it is different from a trade agreement.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Supreme Court has said that it is a contract between two sovereign powers with regard to public welfare. Is not that correct?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the kind of an agreement contemplated, between our Government and a foreign government, with the power given to fix all of our tariff rates within 50 percent, for a period of 3 years, which we cannot go back on, which cannot be repealed by Congress or otherwise, is not a contract, what is a contract?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not agree with the Senator on the proposition at all, for the reason, first, that the Constitution is against it; and, secondly, our uniform course of legislation for 150 years has made a distinction between trade agreements and treaties, in the ordinary and accepted sense of the word "treaty." Of course, both are contracts—one a temporary, the other a permananent arrangement, ordinarily, with some exceptions. That is the main distinction, but it is a distinction which the Congress, since 1789, has upheld; and I am quite sure the Senator has voted to uphold the distinction in the past, just as I have, and I still think that distinction is correct. Otherwise our forefathers would not have provided, as they did, that trade agreements—keeping in mind that they are trade agreements—should be made under article I, section 8, of the Constitution, which provides that the Congress shall have power—not the Senate and the President, but the Congress shall have power—to regulate commerce with foreign nations; and the Congress is regulating that commerce with foreign nations under the law now proposed to be extended.

Another reason why trade agreements are not treaties is because the Congress is fully authorized by the Constitution and our Supreme Court to make these treaties.

As stated, if we undertake by law to make these trade agreements treaties, we are denying to the House of Representatives the power to have any part in regulating commerce with foreign nations. If this amendment is adopted and becomes the law, hereafter all agreements regulating trade under section 8 of article I of the Constitution will be negotiated by the President and approved by two-thirds of the Senate, and the House will be deprived of its constitutional right as expressed in article I, section 8.

The treaty-making power is given in article II, section 2, of the Constitution, and is as follows:

> He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

If we adopt this amendment, we shall deprive the House of its constitutional right to have anything to do with trade agreements. The President, under his treaty-making power, may negotiate any trade agreement he desires, send it to the Senate, have it confirmed by two-thirds of the Senators present, and it will be the law of the land.

Mr. President, our founding fathers knew exactly what they were doing. They provided that the Congress should make the tariff duties and regulate commerce under them; and everything that pertains to them is under the domination and control of the Congress. But when it came to treaties—that is, permanent agreements made and entered into between the governments of the world—they were to be made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring.

Trade agreements are temporary in their nature, and for the purpose of regulating trade and commerce between the countries. The agreements authorized under article II, section 2—that is, treaties—are permanent, and deal with matters concerning permanent relationships of sovereign governments. This is the true distinction, first stated in separate articles of our Constitution, next stated in the uniform practice of our Government from its beginning until the present moment, and lastly upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States.

So, Mr. President, in my judgment there can be not the slightest doubt about the constitutionality of the trade agreements carried in the bill; but for Congress, by its ipse dixit, to declare such agreements treaties, provide for their confirmation by the Senate, and deprive the House of its constitutional powers to join in the regulation of foreign commerce, is itself unconstitutional.

In other words, the trade-agreements policy is first constitutional under the express terms of the Constitution, and in addition to that its constitutionality has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. On the other hand, the Pittman amendment would deprive the House of Representatives of participation in the express grant of power to the House to take part in regulating commerce with foreign nations and, therefore, is unconstitutional.

Another objection raised to the Trade Agreements Act is that such agreements would bind future Congresses for 3 years. That is true; but why not? What possible objection can there be to that? If one Congress authorizes the President or a department to enter into an agreement of any kind, foreign or domestic, for 3 years, that Congress would bind subsequent Congresses for a period of 3 years. Carrying out a contract with a foreign country is a matter of moral obligation, just as carrying out a contract with a citizen of our own country is simply a moral obligation. Future Congresses, of course, are morally bound. So, if we could legally do so, if we should make a trade agreement and it should be ratified by the Senate under this amendment, Congress would be bound by it for a period of 3 years just the same.

A tariff act itself cannot be the only way to regulate commerce. That is the substantive way; that is the way in which the Congress deals with the matter; but surely it cannot be expected, and never was expected by our forefathers, that Congress could fix each rate, could determine each one of the many thousands of rates, in order to regulate commerce. So the Supreme Court has held that that is not the duty of the Congress. The Supreme Court has held that we may delegate, to a tariff board, or to the President, power to regulate, under the terms of the Constitution, trade and commerce with foreign nations.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Can the Senator refer me to a case decided by the Supreme Court in which it has ever held that the President could, by agreement or otherwise, put into force and effect anything except tariff duties specified in the act authorizing him?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. There are cases exactly similar in principle, almost exactly the same in wording, with the exception of authorizing a commission instead of the President; and the President being constitutionally in charge of all our foreign dealings himself, surely if we can give that power to a board, we can give it to the President of the United States.

The opinion in the Hampton case, which was by Chief Justice Taft, held that identically the same thing provided here could be done, with a very slight exception which does not affect the principle at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Hampton case dealt with a situation involving purely domestic affairs, a provision which may be terminated by congressional action at any time we see fit. In the present case we are dealing with contracts made with foreign governments; and I ask the Senator to cite a case dealing with foreign commerce wherein the President has been authorized to do anything except put into effect the duties prescribed in the act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator asks me to cite a case which upholds the constitutionality of this particular act, and which is in harmony with other cases which have been upheld by the Supreme Court—in other words, if the Senator asks whether or not this act has been challenged and the Supreme Court has upheld it—I answer that, as I understand, no such case exists; but that exists which is just as strong. No one has challenged the constitutionality of the Trade Agreements Act, although it has been in force for 6 years. No lawyer, so far as I know or have been able to find, has brought a suit challenging its constitutionality.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a legal question; and that is, if in his opinion anyone would challenge the constitutionality of this particular statute until he had suffered a financial injury either through the raising of rates or the unlawful application of import restrictions referred to in the act?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course the Senator is right that the act cannot be challenged until injury has occurred. Some of these rates have been in force for years. Some persons have told me they have been very greatly injured by them, but have not been sufficiently injured to challenge the constitutionality of the act, or else they had legal advice to the contrary, and in any event they have not challenged the constitutionality of the act.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield only for a question, because my time is limited.

Mr. McCARRAN. I only wish to make the statement, which I hope the Senator will amplify, that it would be impossible for anyone to bring his case to the court of last resort under the language of the existing statute. If the Senator wishes to challenge that statement I shall be glad to have him do so, and to amplify his challenge.

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe there is only one concern in my State, so far as I can now recall, which has felt aggrieved by the change in duties made by the Executive under this act. The duties were modified, and when modified that concern had a right to say whether or not the modification injured it. It said it was injured thereby, and it had a right to sue; but, upon reflection, it concluded not to sue, and has not sued, so far as I know.

Mr. President, there cannot be any question that under the present act the President has power to change the duties upward 50 percent or downward 50 percent. I think I need not go further into that matter.

I have already discussed treaties, so I need not go further into that matter.

Mr. President, I next come to the policy of the Trade Agreements Act. I wish to confess that when the trade-agreements measure was brought before the Senate in 1934 I had some grave misgivings, not with respect to its constitutionality, but concerning its policy. I did not know how that which was proposed by the measure could be effectively done. I wish to say to the Senate that never have I been more agreeably surprised in my life that when I found what was done, and how successfully it had been done. There has been very little complaint—of course, there has been some—with respect to the change in the rates. But let us see what has happened under the Trade Agreements Act.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I should prefer not to yield at the moment. If the Senator will withhold his question for a moment, I will then yield to him.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Twenty-two agreements with other countries are in force and operative, including countries and their dependencies in some cases, such, for example, as the Netherlands and her East Indian dependencies. Twenty-two contracts have been made and have gone into effect. Four others have been made, but they have not gone into effect. What has been the result of these contracts? Have they been hurtful to the United States? Since they have been entered into there has been a 42-percent increase in our exports to these 22 nations and dependencies. What about our imports? The imports from these nations and their dependencies have increased only 15 percent. So there is a net increase of exports over imports of 27 percent; and when we consider the enormous increase in our foreign trade, 27 percent represents a tremendous amount of money. I shall go into that matter in a moment. So I want to say that I have never been more agreeably surprised and delighted than I have been in the working out of the trade agreements under the administration of Secretary Hull, as I shall hereafter more fully point out.

I now yield to the Senator from Nevada, and I hope he will make his question short.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, does the Senator believe, or will he contend, that more beneficial results have flowed from this system of legislation than could have flowed from one which was constitutional?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think we have applied a constitutional system to this matter.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed I will; but there is something else I wish to say, and I ask the Senator to rise later and ask me the question he has in mind.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let us see under what circumstances this legislation was passed. The new administration had already taken care of domestic questions. We had passed laws to put agriculture on a more permanent and prosperous foundation. We had passed laws providing for the absolute security and soundness of our banking institutions. We had passed laws for the protection and improvement of industry. We had passed laws for the protection of the unemployed. We had passed laws putting labor in our country in a position in which it might enjoy the fruits of its work. We had passed laws for the protection and security of our home owners and our farm owners. We had passed laws for the relief of the hungry and helpless. All of these laws were denounced and criticized, but time has proven the efficacy of all of them.

All these things were done before we went into the question of our commerce with foreign nations.

In order that we may see more fully the practical working out of the trade agreements it is necessary for us to consider the condition of our country when this administration came into power in March 1933. When Secretary Hull went into office on March 4, 1933, the economic condition of this country had never been worse. Agriculture was bankrupt. Industry was bankrupt. Right now I am looking into the face of a Senator in whose State great institutions were either in dire straits or in actual bankruptcy. Our banks were bankrupt. The country was in a deplorable condition, and commerce with foreign nations was even at a lower ebb than was our domestic trade and commerce. Between 1929 and March 1933 the aggregate national income of our people had fallen from $81,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000, in round numbers. Wages and salaries in manufacturing industry had dropped from $15,000,000,000 to $7,000,000,000. Nonfarm employment had dropped from $36,000,000,000 to $27,000,000,000.

Mr. President, what happened? The first thing we did was to get the banks out of bankruptcy and put them on a solid foundation, guaranteeing their deposits under the best banking system we have had, under one of the ablest men I know, the head of the F. D. I. C., Mr. Leo T. Crowley, one of the ablest, most efficient, and finest men in the Government service. We put the banks on a solid foundation, and they have remained on that solid foundation ever since.

Then we undertook to put agriculture on the same sort of solid basis, or to restore it as far as we could; and we made great strides in that direction.

We undertook to restore industry, and we have made wonderful strides in that direction.

We undertook to increase the wages of labor all over the country, and we have made wonderful strides in that respect.

But what was lacking in what we were doing in a domestic way to give us true success? We lacked foreign trade. Our friends on the other side of the aisle for a long time tried to make it appear that foreign trade meant very little to this country; that all that it was necessary to do was to raise a tariff wall. They thought all they had to do was to raise a tariff wall, first, like the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, later the Fordney-McCumber Act, and still later the Hawley-Smoot Act. Their theory was, "Raise the tariff rates, pay no attention to foreign trade, and the country will be prosperous."

But in 1929 all those things went by the board, and we were in the direst distress. We first took care of domestic problems, as I have very briefly outlined. After that, what happened in 1934?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield. Will the Senator repeat his question?

Mr. McCARRAN. I wish to propound another question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator first to repeat the question which he previously asked. I yielded for that purpose.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator believe that more effective results have flowed from the application of the present law than would flow from a constitutional application of the law, in which Congress would be the appraiser of the law?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will sit down, I shall be glad to answer that question.

Mr. President, I have been in Congress a long time. I first came to the House of Representatives in 1911. We Democrats were then complaining of the iniquities——

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait a moment. I do not yield now.

Mr. McCARRAN. But the Senator is avoiding the question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I never avoided a question in my life. If the Senator will be good enough to bear with me for just a moment, I shall answer his question. The Senator has asked a question, and I wish to answer it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Why does not the Senator answer it "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will answer the question in my own way if the Senator will resume his seat for a moment.

We promised the people of the country in the Wilson administration that we would revise the tariff according to the method suggested by the Senator from Nevada. When we came in, Mr. Oscar Underwood, our leader in the House, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, introduced a bill reducing the high tariff rates which then existed. I was in the House at the time. I do not speak from hearsay. I speak from actual knowledge. At that time Washington was full of lobbyists. I see my distinguished friend whom I love very dearly, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], smiling when I make that statement. He was in the Senate at the time. He knows that what I say is true. Representatives of the predatory, selfish interests were here in such great numbers that sometimes one could not be sure whether or not they were members of one of the congressional bodies.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I can help the Senator very much.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to reply to the Senator. I cannot yield now. I beg the Senator to excuse me for just a moment.

Mr. McCARRAN. I can help the Senator, if he wishes to have me do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not wish to be helped. I am capable of making my own speech.

I wish the Senator could have been in Washington when all that logrolling was going on. Every man who had a factory came to Washington to have the protective rates left in effect for the benefit of his factory, and taken off with respect to some other factory. There were agreements among Representatives, and agreements among Senators. There was logrolling in its worst sense. I see the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] in the Chamber. He was in the House at the time. He knows that what I say is true. Every selfish interest was here undertaking to increase the tariff, and imploring us, "For God's sake, increase the tariff rates a little on this, or a little on that."

What was the result? Under the so-called constitutional method suggested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the Underwood tariff of 1913 was one of the greatest regrets of the Democratic Party at that time.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then the Constitution is a failure, is it?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the Constitution is not a failure.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then Congress is a failure?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. We did not regulate as we propose to regulate under the reciprocal-trade agreements. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] can bear witness to what I say. Lobbyists in behalf of the selfish interests were everywhere. We even had to pass a resolution barring lobbyists from the House of Representatives.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator please allow me to proceed?

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator now say that Congress is so cowardly that it cannot withstand lobbyists?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says no such thing.

Mr. McCARRAN. What does the Senator say?

Mr. McKELLAR. I say that this Congress is independent enough, courageous enough, and honest enough to pursue a plan which will regulate commerce with foreign nations without undergoing all the things which I have enumerated.

Mr. NEELY rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from West Virginia in just a moment.

Mr. Hull, the present Secretary of State, was at that time in Congress. He was a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. He knew what logrolling there was when a tariff bill came up. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and other Senators were in the Senate in 1922 when the Fordney-McCumber bill came up. My heavens! The big interests descended upon Washington like the grasshoppers out in the State of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]. He tells me they sometimes darken the sky. Lobbyists in Washington were as thick as grasshoppers. They were logrolling. They were reaching Senators and Representatives in any way they could. Who knows it better than Cordell Hull, who was in Congress at the time, or the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], or myself? We were in Congress in 1930 when the Smoot-Hawley tariff measure was passed. A lobbying expedition was in full swing.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator excuse me for a moment? I promised to yield first to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. I know he will wait.

What was the situation? Mr. Hull knew the situation as well as did anyone else.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator believe——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment.

Mr. McCARRAN. I merely wish to ask a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator please resume his seat for a little while?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I love the Senator, but I do not want him constantly interfering with the thread of my thought.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please not interrupt the Senator from Tennessee, unless he agrees to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very happy to yield in a little while.

Mr. President, I say without fear of successful contradiction on this side of the aisle or on the other side of the aisle that the President was unusually fortunate in the selection of Cordell Hull as Secretary of State.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator——

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator has called for a reply.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that the Senator objects to Mr. Hull. Is that correct?

Mr. McCARRAN. No, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield, Mr. President.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair reminds Senators that they may obtain recognition only by addressing the Chair, and may ask questions only if the Senator from Tennessee agrees to yield. The Senator from Tennessee says he declines to yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator has stated that he challenges any Senator on either side of the aisle to contradict a certain statement which he has made. It is my position—I may be wrong, and I shall take the ruling of the Chair—that any Senator on either side of the aisle has the right to answer the challenge.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I decline to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is of the opinion that if the Senator did issue a challenge, he wants it to be accepted at a later time. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor, and he declines to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to yield to my friend if he will not constantly bob up and undertake to interfere with the continuity of my speech. The Senator has plenty of time to speak on this, or any other subject. The other day he spoke for 2 hours, unmolested. There is no reason why he should constantly attempt to interrupt me.

Mr. McCARRAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I shall not do so any further.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the President of the United States was particularly fortunate in the selection of Mr. Hull as Secretary of State. Mr. Hull was born in Tennessee. He was educated at Cumberland University. He was a soldier in defense of his country in the Spanish-American War. He became a member of the State legislature. Later he was elected and served as judge of one of the circuit courts of Tennessee. He was then elected to the House of Representatives and served in that body for 22 years. He commanded the respect, esteem, and admiration of every Member of the House, irrespective of party politics or any other consideration. Afterward he was elected a United States Senator from the State of Tennessee, and he served in this body for 2 years.

When the President was elected, after looking all over this great country for able men to head his administration, he sent for Mr. Hull and made him Secretary of State. I say it was a marvelous piece of good fortune for Mr. Roosevelt that he selected Mr. Hull. Why do I say it? Mr. Hull was fitted for the office by education, by training, by judicial poise, by experience at home, by a remarkable experience in the House of Representatives, by service on the Ways and Means Committee, and by reason of being an expert on tariffs and foreign trade. No man could have been found who had a clearer knowledge of our foreign trade than did Mr. Hull. He had been, in very large measure, the author of a tariff bill and other bills affecting foreign trade. He had made a success of his efforts along that line.

While I am referring to him I know the Senate will pardon me for saying that I have known Cordell Hull for more than a quarter of a century. He is highly educated; he is able; he is vigorous; he is determined; he is familiar with his duties; and, over all and above all, he is the noblest work of God in that he is an honest man. Never has there been the slightest suggestion to the contrary. In all his long public life, now extending over a period of 48 years, never has it been intimated that Cordell Hull was not the soul of honor, that he was not a noble man. As I look over on the Republican side, I may say, in the best of spirit, that if Cordell Hull belonged to that side of the Chamber instead of to this, every last Republican Senator would be singing his praises today, because he is sane; he is able; he is progressive; he has those gifts and talents that qualify him for the performance of the highest duties in the service of the American people. So, if he was a member of the Republican Party, Republican Senators would not only be singing his praises but I imagine that many of them would be willing to stand aside and let him take a place of even higher preference in the Government of the United States. I wish to say here as a personal friend of Mr. Hull for a period of more than a quarter of a century, knowing how he has fulfilled every duty of life, how able and efficient he was as a legislator, as a circuit judge, as a Representative in Congress, as national chairman of the Democratic Party, as a Senator, and as Secretary of State, I regard him as one of the great living statesmen of his age, and, in my judgment, history will accord him such a place. So, when the President came to select his Cabinet he put Mr. Hull at the head of it.

Mr. Hull knew all about logrolling; he had seen it in person and had been the victim of it.

Since I spoke a moment ago about other times in the House of Representatives there has come into the Senate Chamber and taken his seat another distinguished former Member of the House at the time Mr. Hull was there. I refer to the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. GEORGE W. NORRIS, who was a very distinguished Member of the House of Representatives at that time, just as he is an able and outstanding Senator at this time. He knows what I say is true.

So, when Mr. Roosevelt sent for Mr. Hull and talked to him about the tariff situation, who knew better about the logrolling in connection with the Underwood bill and the McCumber-Fordney bill and the Smoot-Hawley bill than did Mr. Hull? Who knew better than Mr. Hull about the failure, in part, of the Underwood tariff law, for he took part in the framing of that famous measure? Who knew better? No man in this country knew those facts better than did Cordell Hull. What was the result? The result was that Mr. Hull—I have never talked with him about it in my life; I am speaking of what I believe took place at the time—said if we should undertake to deal with the tariff by the old logrolling process, which we had done so often and had gotten burned every time, even on our own side, we would never get anywhere. So he proposed that we should follow the express terms of the Constitution when it says that Congress shall have the power to make agreements with foreign countries. He took the Smoot-Hawley law just as it was; he did not attempt to change it in the slightest degree, but simply suggested the trade-agreements bill under which the President would be allowed, in accordance with the terms of the Constitution, to regulate commerce. If the Trade Agreements Act has not been a success, who can produce the facts to prove that it has not been a success? When it increased our foreign trade from $1,600,000,000 in 1934 to $3,160,000,000 in 1939, who can say that it has not been a success?

It is said the program is operating in the interest of foreign countries. I deny it. Why do I deny it? I repeat that the facts show that under the 22 agreements which have been negotiated our exports have increased 42 percent, while imports from other nations have increased only 15 percent. That is a difference of 27 percent, or more than one-fourth of all our exports.

Furthermore, note what has been accomplished in specific instances. Our cotton exports last year were only a little over a million bales; this year we have already exported nearly two and one-half million bales.

I am looking into the face of the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], for whom I have the greatest respect, and for whose ability and honesty and sincerity I have likewise the greatest respect. I ask if the trade agreements have hurt the automobile business in his State? No. They have not hurt, but have greatly aided the automobile business everywhere. The trade agreements have increased our business over 27 percent. They have been a success from the beginning. In the first year when any of the agreements were in effect, I happened to be so lucky as to take a trip around the world, and I found Fords and Buicks almost everywhere. I traveled, in part, across the Arabian Desert in a Buick. All those cars came from the State of Michigan. They have been sold everywhere. Why? Because we have, under this constitutional system, regulated foreign commerce so as to be able to sell our goods and wares all over the world, and we have not tried to take everything, as was done under the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill.

I am glad the Senator from Michigan is present, as I wish to refer to the argument ably presented by him 2 or 3 days ago. There are several statements I want first to challenge and then to answer if I may. I think he is wrong on his proposal, and the arguments that he made Wednesday cannot be sustained.

I quote from the Associated Press summation of his arguments:

1. The trade-agreements law is unconstitutional.
2. It is "economic dictatorship come to America."
3. It is driving the country to a basis of uncompensated low tariffs "which will ultimately wreck us."
4. War and post-war trade competitions involve a multitude of dangerous trade weapons which the agreement law cannot touch.
5. It is not working and cannot work as intended.
6. The alternative is to provide "a concentrated foreign trade authority which can cope with all the external-trade penalties which American export increasingly confronts."

Now, I desire to comment on each of these statements.

The Senator first says that the Trade Agreements Act is unconstitutional. I have already discussed this question, and have shown, I believe, that it is constitutional. It is inconceivable to me that if such acts are unconstitutional we have made them all during our history, amounting in number to more than 1,000. I do not believe this contention of the Senator from Michigan is correct.

Our Supreme Court has decided otherwise and has decided the same principle so often that although this law has been in force for 6 long years, no one has challenged its constitutionality.

The second argument of the Senator from Michigan is this:

It is "economic dictatorship come to America."

The next two I want to take out of their order. I skip 3 and 4, and read No. 5:

It is not working and cannot work as intended.

It cannot be a dictatorship if it is not working and cannot work. I have noticed, in my limited experience, that dictators usually work. If the "economic dictatorship" that has come to America, in the view of the Senator from Michigan, is so inoffensive and so unworkable, it cannot be a dictatorship; or, if it is a dictatorship, it cannot mean anything to the American people. I say it is not an economic dictatorship, and I say it is working. The Senator will find, if he will look at the figures, that nowhere in this Nation is it working better than in the good State of Michigan. He will find that the sale of automobiles, for which his State is famous, has gone up by leaps and bounds, and his State is receiving the benefit of it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not care to interrupt the Senator each time I disagree with his statements respecting my previous address, though I should not want my silence to indicate consent to the Senator's rather extravagant analysis; but——

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait one minute. I am not analyzing the Senator's speech. The Associated Press, which I consider the greatest and fairest news-gathering agency in all the world, has printed this analysis of the Senator's address, and it has been published without denial in every newspaper in the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Every quotation which the Senator is making from the Associated Press is accurate and correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh. Now we are getting somewhere.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes. The dissent which I registered was to the Senator's observations upon the statements in the Associated Press article. I just want to comment upon the final observation which the Senator submitted to me that the trade agreements are responsible for a tremendous increase in exports of automobiles.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not wholly, but very largely.

Mr. VANDENBERG. All right; very largely.

The automobile exports were $280,000,000 in 1939. They were $250,000,000 in 1935, a year before the trade agreements were fully in effect. The increase in automotive exports is 85 or 90 percent due to the recuperation in world consumptive buying power, and not to the Trade Agreements Act at all. Nevertheless, as I said in the address to which the Senator refers, the State Department has been completely considerate of the automobile industry in connection with these negotiations.

Mr. McKELLAR. It certainly has.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I expressed my gratitude to the Department. I simply dissent from the analysis of the resultant figures.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator that world conditions have brought about the improvement in the automobile trade. I believe it is principally due to the great, constructive measures of this administration, which have restored our whole country, which have given us a better buying power, which have given labor a better wage throughout the country and made people prosperous. That is the first thing; but the next thing, very close to it in importance, is the trade agreements.

The Senator from Michigan then makes the argument that the trade-agreements law is driving the country to a basis of uncompensated low tariffs which will ultimately wreck us. That contention cannot be sustained. It is true that our tariff duties are lower, but, on the other hand, the tariff duties of foreign countries with which we made these agreements are lower; and therefore there can be no injury, since the duties of both countries are lower. The present law facilitates trade. It builds up commerce. It builds up trade, as our figures of 42 percent as against 15 percent will show. So I think it is almost manifest that this position which the Senator from Michigan takes is incorrect.

The fourth position which the Senator from Michigan takes is this:

War and post-war trade competitions involve a multitude of dangerous trade weapons which the agreement law cannot touch.

This is a generality, and ordinarily would not require an answer; but the answer is so specific and so certain that I feel that it ought to be given here.

Suppose we had the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act in force in its original terms, as we shall have unless the Trade Agreements Act is extended. How would it be possible for us to deal with the subject for America at all? We should simply be hedged in by the highest tariff wall in the history of our country, with no possible method of obtaining trade from foreign countries. That seems to be manifestly true.

Lastly, I come to argument No. 6, which is a suggested alternative. The Senator from Michigan would have—

A concentrated foreign-trade authority which can cope with all the external trade penalties which American export increasingly confronts.

That is exactly the same thing in principle as the present law. I have not seen the Senator's proposal other than as stated here, but it necessarily would be on the same principle as the present Trade Agreements Act. The President is certainly a "concentrated foreign-trade authority," and no authority we could set up would be as concentrated as the President, because the President has other powers in regard to foreign affairs which make him the most concentrated power of all. But if such an authority were set up, how could it cope with external trade penalties? Of course, that would bring on an economic warfare which would injure trade and not help trade; and for these reasons it seems to me the argument of the Senator from Michigan is not sound.

By the way, the Senator's question leads me to say another thing. The Senator denounces Secretary Hull's trade agreements, if we may call them Secretary Hull's trade agreements, and I think we may.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says "Yes," and I endorse his statement. Less than 6 months ago almost every Member on the Republican side of the aisle—as I recall, the Senator from Michigan was one of them—was denouncing another measure which had been proposed by Secretary Hull. It was a neutrality measure. The Senator remembers and all of us remember that when the neutrality measure was before this body about 4 or 5 months ago, Senators on the other side of the aisle were saying that it was going to get us into war; it was going to destroy peace; it was going to destroy returning prosperity; it would ruin the country. That was the substance of the criticisms that were made. Were your criticisms right then? Are we not at peace? We are not at war. There is no prospect of our getting into war; yet the neutrality law has been on the statute books for nearly 4 months. You were wrong then, and you are wrong in this instance.

This is another proposal of Secretary Hull. He did not send it up here haphazard. He worked over it for nearly 2 years before it was sent to the Congress. He took your law and then, under the power to regulate commerce, he applied the facts in individual cases and individual countries to your law, which was the highest tariff law we had ever had. He applied to that law the constitutional power to regulate commerce, and the act which resulted is going to be a success. It has already been a success. If we have increased our trade with 22 foreign countries by a net amount of 27 percent or by a gross amount of 42 percent, we shall do the same thing with the other nations when we make trade agreements with them.

You may talk about the failure of his Neutrality Act as you did talk about it. You are silent about it now. You may talk about his Trade Agreements Act as you are doing now, but you will be silent about it in a short period of time, just as you are now silent about the Neutrality Act.

Mr. President, this is no time for politics. This is no time for division along party lines, just as last fall was no time for division along party lines. We passed a neutrality law at that time. Did you ever hear of a criticism of the way in which it has operated? I have not seen the word "neutrality" in the newspapers for weeks, so far as I can recall. Certainly I have not seen it in any prominent place in the newspapers for that length of time; yet 4 or 5 months ago nearly every newspaper in the country was denouncing the neutrality law as being certain to get us into war; just as many of them now are denouncing the Trade Agreements Act as being unconstitutional and as getting us into economic trouble. Within 3 months after its passage—as it will pass, in my judgment—you will cease criticizing this measure, and you will be criticizing some other administration measure.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to join the able Senator from Tennessee in paying a great tribute to the able Secretary of State, Mr. Hull; and I should like to do it in his own language, if I may, by reading a very short excerpt from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which is his crowning glory and his greatest achievement, in language or otherwise. Will the Senator kindly permit its insertion in the RECORD? It is very short.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. Anything that will reflect the honor and integrity and conspicuous public service of Cordell Hull I will always agree may come before the Senate and before the country.

Mr. McCARRAN. I read this excerpt from the remarks of the Secretary of State when he was a Member of the House of Representatives because, in my judgment, it is his crowning glory. It is the greatest statement he ever made.

He said:

Mr. Chairman, the proposed revision provides in effect that the valuation by appraisers shall be final except by appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury. This astonishing proposal strips bare the jurisdiction of the Customs Court and its authority to adjudicate unquestioned and hitherto unchallenged rights of the citizens. This is bureaucracy run mad. The very suggestion that the most valuable property rights of the citizen can be disposed of or dealt with as a finality by the Treasury Department with the slightest recourse to the courts of the country is wholly impossible to understand.

The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible-tariff clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English king the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of a government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion, "this is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator give the date of that statement by Judge Hull?

Mr. McCARRAN. It was made on May 13, 1929, on the floor of the House of Representatives.

Mr. McKELLAR. My recollection is that it was even before that; but, however that may be, since that statement was made the Supreme Court has rendered an opinion which forever settled that question. It was held that the Congress, under its constitutional power, may do precisely what Judge Hull has recommended in regard to these trade agreements.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me say that, as the Senator from Tennessee has suggested, the Supreme Court of the United States on several different occasions, since the statement of the present Secretary of State to which the Senator from Nevada has referred, has overruled that view, and has decided that the flexible provisions of the tariff were constitutional; and to my mind by that decision they decided the present case.

Mr. McCARRAN rose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Just a moment. Let me say further, if the Senator from Tennessee will permit me for just a second——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In all the long hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate, either the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the committee, or I myself, in the case of every witness who appeared before the committee asked him whether the industry he represented had been injured in any way by the operation of the reciprocal trade agreements statute, as administered by the present Secretary of State, and with only two or three exceptions everyone of them admitted that they had not been hurt. Some of them admitted that they had been benefited, and some of them said they were afraid they might be hurt sometime.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Missouri is quite correct. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. Let me say that the final word on this entire subject was spoken by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Panama case, decisive of every conjecture which might have entered into the former decisions. In the Panama case the court held, if it held anything, when it set aside a statute enacted by the Congress, that this entire method of procedure was unconstitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not agree with the Senator at all; but I could never convince him that I was right and that he was wrong, so we just have to go to bat, and work it out in the vote.

Let me give some figures as to exports which show what has happened under our recent tariff acts and under the trade agreements.

In 1929, under the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act, our exports had reached the enormous sum of $5,250,000,000, in round numbers. The Hawley-Smoot Act was then passed, and our exports dropped to less than $4,000,000,000. In 1931, under the Hawley-Smoot Act, they had dropped to less than $2,500,000,000. In 1932 they had dropped to $1,600,000,000, and then we passed the present Hull Trade Agreements Act, and our exports almost immediately began to climb.

In 1934 our exports were over $2,000,000,000. In 1935 they were about $2,300,000,000. In 1936 they were $2,500,000,000. In 1937 they were $3,300,000,000. In 1938 they were $3,000,000,000. In 1939 they were $3,177,000,000.

Mr. President, these figures tell the story.

Mr. President, the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, which at the time of its passage was alleged to be of the very essence of Republican tariff policy, is still on the statute books. It utterly failed to help our country. Our exports went down by more than two-thirds under that act. Then the Hull formula, as shown in the Trade Agreements Act, was put into effect, and the changes took place as I have stated. We have not gone back to the high exports of 1929, but we have doubled our exports under this wise enactment.

HOW THIS HAS BEEN DONE

As shown by a table furnished by Mr. Grady, of the State Department, we have made agreements with 26 countries, including dependencies, under that act; and there has been a large increase in exports, running from 4 percent in the case of Honduras to 200 percent in the case of the East Indies, and averaging in all the trade-agreement contract countries 42 percent. It is true that our imports from most of these countries have likewise increased though in the case of three of the countries they have actually decreased. It is a wonderful story of accomplishment, Mr. President. Think of it. Our exports increased by 42 percent and our imports from the same countries increased only 15 percent, or a difference of 27 percent in favor of America's export business.

If we could make similar agreements with all the rest of the world—and Mr. Hull proposes to do it if this joint resolution passes—in my judgment, Mr. President, our prosperity in this country would be fabulous.

Mr. President, I know it is the theory of many persons, largely among our Republican friends, that foreign trade is not absolutely necessary to our prosperity in this country. This theory is not tenable. In the United States we make more than we can consume, and as long as that condition prevails our foreign trade is necessarily of vital importance to us. A healthy foreign trade means prosperity to all our people. A small export trade means depression. It has been proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that this country cannot prosper behind the high tariff walls of a Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. The whole fabric of a high tariff fell to earth when depression came. That act was wholly incapable of meeting the situation of a world depression or a domestic depression. It was necessary, therefore, when this administration took office in 1933, to recapture our foreign trade if full prosperity was to be restored.

How could this recapture best be made? Was it best for the Democrats to pass another logrolling tariff law, or was it best to take the law as it stood and adopt this trade-agreements plan of giving the President the right, under the express terms of the Constitution, to raise or lower tariff rates in order to regain our foreign trade?

Mr. President, in conclusion I wish to say that I have demonstrated, by the citations from the Constitution, and by the citations from the Supreme Court, that the trade-agreements law is in every sense constitutional and valid. I think I have shown by my review of the facts that these trade agreements have been of tremendous value in increasing American trade and commerce abroad. I believe they have added tremendously to our success commercially, economically, and in every other sense. I believe the highest tariff rates ever put into a law were those in the Smoot-Hawley law, and, by Secretary Hull's ability and sagacity in working out the trade agreements we have done away with the usual logrolling in the fixing of rates sought by the great selfish interests of this country. We have done it quietly, it has been done effectively, it has increased American trade with the 22 countries with which we have had agreements to the enormous extent of 42 percent.

Mr. President, with one further observation I shall conclude. Instead of the trade-agreements law being unconstitutional, the Pittman amendment is unconstitutional, for the reason that it would take away from the House of Representatives its power, with the Senate and the President, to regulate commerce with foreign nations. That is exactly what it would do. We would set up a new system. We would do away with the precedents of 150 years if we should declare agreements of this kind to come under the regulatory clause of the Constitution, and attempt to have them held to be treaties. If we undertook to do that, we would be undertaking to do an unconstitutional thing.

If I ever was convinced that an amendment was unconstitutional, I am thoroughly convinced that the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nevada, proposing that we take trade agreements with foreign countries out of the hands of the Congress and put them into the hands of the Senate and of the President, is unconstitutional. With that observation, I submit the case.

Mr. GURNEY obtained the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment so that I may have a matter inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. GURNEY. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I shall in a very brief sentence or two explain what I wish to have go into the RECORD.

The reciprocal-trade agreements have affected not only the countries with which the trade agreements have been made, but under the most-favored-nation clause have affected other countries of the world, because they have resulted in imports coming into the United States from other countries.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Inasmuch as there is a time limit in effect, if the Senator from South Dakota is going to yield for a speech, I must insist on the rule being enforced.

Mr. McCARRAN. I did not intend to start to make a speech. I am sorry the Senator is so aroused——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is a time limit, and the Senator from Nevada has already occupied his own time, and there are some other Senators who would like to insert some things in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota has the floor. He has yielded to the Senator from Nevada for the purpose of having something inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. McCARRAN. This is just a sentence in explanation and nothing more. I will not take the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GURNEY. Only for the purpose of putting something in the RECORD.

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a certain series of correspondence between Secretary Hull and those under Secretary Hull with the president of the Manganese Association of America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matters will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matters referred to are as follows:

AMERICAN MANGANESE PRODUCERS ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., June 9, 1936.

Hon. CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The trade agreement with Russia expires July 13.

In the best interest of the United States and with full respect for the efforts of the State Department to expand foreign markets, we respectfully ask that no new agreement be made whereby manganese ores and alloys may be imported from Russia under any reduction in duties.

In order that the subject may be properly considered, we further ask that no agreement of any kind be negotiated with Russia without due notice and hearings as required by law.

It is reliably reported that Brazil is contemplating trade treaties with Germany and Italy, whereby those countries will be given special trade benefits not to be enjoyed by the United States. Such treaties would, in effect, abrogate the trade agreement between the United States and Brazil.

The official Government document Manganese and Manganiferous Ores for the year 1935, published by the United States Bureau of Mines under the direction of Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary, Department of the Interior, page 483, states as follows:

"On February 2, 1935, the United States and Brazil signed a reciprocal-trade agreement which, among other concessions, provided for a reduction of 50 percent in the present American duty on manganese ore imported from Brazil. If confined to Brazil, the lowered duty will inevitably stimulate production there. If, however, the reduction in duty is granted other nations supplying the American market, Brazil will have no competitive advantage due to the agreement."

If the reduction in the manganese duty is extended to Russia and other countries, there would be no particular reason why Brazil should not abrogate the trade agreement with the United States.

The Brazilian agreement, cutting the duty on manganese ore and extending the same cut to Russia and other nations, means a loss to the United States Treasury of approximately $2,500,000 collectible as duty on manganese previously imported and stored in the bonded warehouses of the steel companies in the United States at the time the agreement became effective. It means a continued, additional loss to the United States Treasury of approximately $2,500,000 per year in tariff on ores regularly being imported. For the reason that little or no benefits, sufficient to offset the losses, are derived through this agreement, either by the United States or Brazil, we fail to see any reason why the United States should not likewise desire to abrogate the trade agreement with Brazil.

There can be no adequate national security as long as the United States remains dependent upon foreign manganese with the source of supply 4,000 miles away.

Recovery of high-grade manganese from the enormous deposits of lower grade ores in the United States is inevitable. Any policy which retards this development is against the national interest.

Since the United States signed the trade agreement with Brazil the Bureau of Mines has announced recovery of pure manganese from ores running as low as 10 to 15 percent. This gives added support to new processes previously developed whereby the highest grade ores known in the world's markets may be recovered from the deposits in the United States. These deposits, however, cannot be developed and plants installed in the short period of time ordinarily allowed in an emergency.

A reduction in the duty on manganese was not intended by the President and Congress in the passage of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act.

The President in his message to Congress on the 2d day of March 1934, requesting this legislation, said:

"You and I know, too, that it is important that the country possess within its borders a necessary diversity and balance to maintain a rounded national life, that it must sustain activities vital to national defense, and that such interests cannot be sacrificed for passing advantage."

Proper consideration for manganese for national-defense purposes is definitely expressed in the manganese petition to the President, signed by 41 Senators and 145 Congressmen, and presented to the President June 29, 1934.

In hearings before Congress, Hon. Francis B. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State, testified that the policy under the trade agreements would be as follows:

"The whole purpose of the program of trade bargaining is this: To restrict the commodities covered in the agreement with any specific country to commodities of which that country furnishes the chief source of supply of importation into the United States."

The opposite to this was done. Manganese was traded away to Brazil, a minor producer of the ore. Russia, the major producer, should not be allowed entrance through the "back door" of the Brazilian agreement.

The suggestion has been made that we conserve our manganese resources. Facts would indicate this is perfect nonsense.

The total known reserves of iron ore in the United States are estimated at 1,500,000,000 tons, or enough to make 750,000,000 tons of steel. The manufacture into steel of the known reserves of iron ore in the United States will consume at the most only 12,000,000 tons of high-grade manganese ore. Some manganese deposits in the United States require the mining and treatment of 2 tons of crude manganese ore for each ton of high-grade manganese ore shipped; others require 3 to 1, and so on. Taking an outside figure, and say it would require an average of 5 tons of crude manganese ore mined to produce 1 ton of high-grade manganese ore running 50 percent metallic manganese, it would require at the utmost only 60,000,000 tons of crude low-grade manganese ore to produce the high-grade ore necessary to manufacture into steel all the known reserves of iron ore in the United States. It is well recognized that there are reserves of low-grade manganese ores in the United States approximating 200,000,000 tons, and further work will undoubtedly disclose additional reserves, although only 60,000,000 tons may be required.

Manganese and Manganiferous Ores, 1929, United States Bureau of Mines, page 295, states as follows:

In view of the fact that there is possibly 200,000,000 tons of low-grade manganiferous material in the United States to which certain beneficiation processes may be applied in the future, it may be of interest to outline the occurrence of manganese ores and the methods that have been developed for treating these ores."

These tremendous manganese reserves, however, unless they are developed, will be of no more use in an emergency than they were during the last war. A healthy nucleus of a manganese industry in the United States is an urgent national need. The sacrifice of the manganese developments in the United States through reciprocal-trade agreements constitutes an irreparable national loss. Mines previously developed are now fast being abandoned and allowed to fill with water, and collapse. The lack of these developments in time of need may contribute to a national calamity.

During the year 1918 the price of manganese ore, on a basis of 50 percent metallic manganese, f. o. b. Chicago, was $68.50 per ton, and a sufficient tonnage necessary for the proper manufacture of munitions was not available from domestic or foreign sources even at this price.

When it is realized that we normally use 1,000,000 tons of 50-percent grade manganese ore, or its equivalent in lower grade, per year, it may well be understood that the dollar cost of unpreparedness would far offset any small passing advantage which might be obtained through the trading away of manganese under the reciprocal-trade agreements.

With proper time for development, ores running 50 percent metallic manganese may be obtained from domestic sources at costs ranging from $30 to $35 per ton. With consumption at the rate of 1,000,000 tons per year and the price $68.50 per ton experienced during the last war, the added penalty paid by the Government in an emergency, in 1 year alone, would be in excess of $30,000,000.

The following figures from published reports of the United States Bureau of Mines show the increase in domestic production of manganese ores following the tariff on high-grade ores granted in 1922:

Manganese ores shipped from mines in the United States

Grade of ore	Year	Long tons	Year	Long tons
5 to 10 percent manganese	1921	62,670	1929	1,110,067
10 to 35 percent manganese	1921	8,439	1926	384,312
35 percent manganese and above	1921	13,531	1925	98,324

Following the tariff in 1922, years were spent in development of mines and in working out processes to successfully recover the high-grade ores from the lower-grade deposits. This was accomplished and in 1929 the domestic industry stood ready to produce gradually increasing tonnages of the higher-grade ores in accordance with market demands.

On account of the depression, decline in both steel production and consumption of manganese, the years 1929 to 1935, inclusive, reflect a comparative drop in demand and prices of manganese ores. This price drop was augmented largely through the dumping of manganese ores on the world's markets by the Soviets at the beginning of their 5-year plan in 1929, following which the Soviet ores were sold on a flooded market at almost any prices they would bring. During this period American ore buyers accumulated large stocks of ores in reserve. Five hundred and two thousand tons of manganese ore were imported into the United States during the year 1931 alone.

The Russian dumping policy is clearly described in two memoranda, both dated August 5, 1929, prepared by E. C. Ropes, chief Russian section, Division of Regional Information, United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and supported by certain translations from the Berliner Tageblatt, July 12, 1929, wherein is stated:

"But the Russian effort is directed quite plainly further to shut out so far as possible, by quoting lower prices, other manganese producers and to assure a monopoly for itself.

"If the Russians once maintain a monopoly, which is quite easily possible with their opportunities for dumping, under the system where it is immaterial whether an export trust itself makes or loses, then they will very probably refuse to sell Russian ore to those plants which have adapted their processes at prices acceptable to the consumers, but will demand those rates that will suit them as monopolists."

The special congressional committee created by the House of Representatives to investigate the activities and propaganda of the Communists in the United States, after holding hearings throughout the country and interviewing numerous witnesses, in January 1931 definitely recommended to Congress as follows:

"That immediate consideration be given by the Congress to the placing of an embargo on the importation of manganese from Soviet Russia."

The Soviets subsequently ceased the dumping of manganese ore in the American market.

The year 1936 brings increased steel production, increased manganese consumption and continued depletion of the ore stocks on hand in the United States. Therefore a gradual rise in the price and demand of manganese ore is recorded. This price and market increase may be expected to continue as the production of steel expands and the stocks of ore on hand are consumed. As conditions return to normal, likewise consumption and prices of manganese ore may be expected to return to normal. However, with the reduction in the duty granted to Brazil and extended to other countries through the trade agreements, it is impossible for domestic producers to compete and, unless there is some hope for relief from unfair foreign competition, most domestic mines will be abandoned.

If the normal domestic market is made available to domestic producers, the total sales value, based on average 1924 to 1928 prices of high-grade manganese ores alone, 700,000 tons of 50-percent manganese, delivered at the furnaces of consuming points, would be in excess of $21,000,000. More than half of this amount, or $12,000,000, would represent wages. Allowing $1,000 per man per year, it would mean the employment of approximately 12,000 men per year.

If a policy to encourage further development of domestic manganese is adopted by the Government, new development work, plant construction, and production of ore from existing plants in the manganese districts would directly and indirectly furnish almost immediate employment of from 5,000 to 7,000 men.

According to Vandegrift's survey in Utah, a man employed in the mining and metallurgical industry will support a total population of approximately 15 people, including workmen's families and the service population. On this basis the employment of 12,000 men in producing manganese ores in mining sections would support an additional population of 180,000 people. We do not contend that this could be accomplished in a short period of time, but these facts cannot be ignored in your deliberations.

Sir Robert Hadfield, eminent British metallurgist, in a paper on manganese read before the British Iron & Steel Institute, 1927, stated as follows:

"The old Chinese proverb says, 'They who own the iron of the world rule the world.' It would almost seem safe to add that they who own the manganese of the world have largely in their hands the control of steel of satisfactory quality such as is now necessary to meet modern requirements."

The Assistant Secretary of War, Hon. Hanford MacNider, in a letter to J. Carson Adkerson, October 3, 1927, stated as follows:

"The safety of the country requires that we have a readily available source of manganese within the United States."

The Assistant Secretary of War, Hon. Frederick H. Payne, in an address before the American Manganese Producers Association, November 10, 1930, stated as follows:

"Of the raw materials necessary to us in war, none is more important than manganese. The problem of providing an adequate supply is aggravated by the fact that we largely rely upon foreign sources to meet our demands in this material."

The Assistant Secretary of War, Hon. Frederick H. Payne, in a letter to the American Iron & Steel Institute, February 12, 1932, stated as follows:

"In view of the dependence of the military requirements upon steel products and of the supreme importance of manganese in the making of sound steel, it is deemed essential to have available, at the beginning of a major war, a domestic or nearby operating source of manganese ore.

"To create such an operating source during peacetime the producers must have a market for their output."

Maj. Alfred H. Hobley, speaking in behalf of the War Department (Convention Proceedings, American Manganese Producers Association, p. 42, November 10, 1930), stated as follows:

"After considering all possible solutions to the manganese problem, it appears that one of the safest methods from the standpoint of production in wartime is the development of the domestic industry to the point where it would be in existence and offer a satisfactory nucleus for expansion to the necessary degree to meet the increased needs that might arise as a result of military activity."

On the grounds of national security, and in order that a healthy nucleus of a manganese industry may be maintained in the United States, we respectfully ask that the reduction in the manganese duty not be extended to Russia and that tariff protection be provided sufficient to equalize the cost of production between domestic and foreign manganese ores and alloys.

Respectfully yours,

J. CARSON ADKERSON, President.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 9, 1936.

Mr. J. CARSON ADKERSON,
President, American Manganese Producers' Association,
National Press Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ADKERSON: I have received and read with care your letter of June 9, 1936, in which you point out that the present commercial agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union expires July 13, 1936, and in which you request that no new agreement be made whereby manganese ores and alloys may be imported from the Soviet Union under any reduction in duties and that no agreement of any kind be negotiated with the Soviet Union "without due notice and hearings as required by law." It is noted, furthermore, that you suggest the desirability of abrogating the trade agreement with Brazil, presumably with a view to restoring in what you apparently believe to be the interest of national security and increased employment, the rate of duty on manganese ore provided for in the Tariff Act of 1930.

The reduced duty on manganese ore proclaimed pursuant to the trade agreement with Brazil is applied to imports from the Soviet Union in accordance with the Trade Agreements Act of June 12, 1934, which provides, in effect, that duties proclaimed pursuant to foreign-trade agreements entered into under the authority of that act shall be applied to the articles of all foreign countries which do not discriminate against American commerce or pursue policies or take actions which tend to defeat the purposes of the act. In undertaking as the result of the agreement entered into with this Government on July 13, 1935, to increase substantially its purchases of American products, the Soviet Government indicated its intention of pursuing policies and taking actions in harmony with the purposes of the Trade Agreements Act. In the 10-month period ending April 30 of this year the Soviet purchases of American products amounted to $31,076,007, as compared to $16,840,788 in the 12-month period ending June 30, 1935. It is believed that as long as American commerce is accorded favorable treatment by the Soviet Union it would not be justifiable or in accordance with the provisions of the Trade Agreements Act to withhold from that country the benefits of tariff concessions resulting from reciprocal-trade agreements.

With reference to your request that no agreement of any kind be negotiated with the Soviet Union "without due notice and hearings as required by law," I may point out that the agreement entered into with the Soviet Union on July 13, 1935, although related to the trade-agreements program, was not concluded under the authority of the Trade Agreements Act. The provision of the Trade Agreements Act for public notice of intention to negotiate a trade agreement and an opportunity for interested persons to present their views relative thereto applies only to agreements concluded under the authority of that act. I may assure you, however, that the Department is at all times glad to receive your views in regard to this and other matters.

As to your suggestion that the trade agreement with Brazil be abrogated it may be pointed out that such abrogation would require the mutual consent of the United States and Brazil. Moreover, it is not believed that such action would be to the best interests of this country.

Article XIV of the trade agreement with Brazil provides that the agreement shall continue in force for 2 years (that is, until January 1, 1938), and shall be subject to termination at the expiration of that term or thereafter only upon 6 months' notice, unless terminated in accordance with the provisions of article II, which pertains to the imposition of quantitative restrictions on imports. It may be pointed out in this connection that there is no evidence to indicate that Brazil has not fulfilled the obligations which it has undertaken as a result of its trade agreement with the United States.

The reciprocal concessions provided for in the trade agreement between the United States and Brazil are of substantial benefit to both countries, as is indicated in the enclosed copy of an analysis of the agreement issued by the Department of Commerce on February 7, 1935. In the first 4 months in which the agreement has been in effect, namely, from January 1 to April 30, 1936, Brazil's purchases from the United States increased 5 percent over the amount purchased in the corresponding period of last year. That this increase in our exports to Brazil is due in a large measure to our trade agreement with that country is indicated by the fact that the increase, in case of commodities with respect to which reductions in the Brazilian rates of duty were obtained, was 20 percent, whereas in the case of commodities with respect to which no concessions were obtained it was only 2 percent.

It cannot be doubted that Brazil regards as important the duty reduction obtained with respect to manganese ore. This is evidenced by the substantial concessions which Brazil granted in return for that reduction and other concessions made by the United States to Brazil. Inasmuch as the trade-agreements program is based upon the principle of most-favored-nation treatment, it was not intended that Brazil should, as a result of the trade agreement, be given a preferential advantage in the American market with respect to manganese ore or any other commodity. This policy was, of course, well known to the Brazilian Government at the time the trade agreement was signed.

You may be assured that the questions of national security and increased employment involved in the reduction of the duty on manganese were, among others, given very careful study, not only by this Department but also by other departments and agencies of the government concerned. With reference to the question of national security, it is interesting to note the following views of the Planning Committee for Mineral Policies contained in the report made on December 1, 1934, by the National Resources Board:

"To encourage development of certain minerals in which we are deficient, such as manganese, mercury, and tungsten, tariffs have been imposed. It has usually been argued on behalf of tariffs—often without careful scrutiny of the reserve situation—that they would make possible the development of new supplies. In practice, however, the encouragement of tariffs has not greatly aided exploration, discovery, and research; on the contrary, the stimulus of a protected market of uncertain duration has merely accelerated the depletion of the few high-grade deposits we have at a time when consideration for national defense requires that such limited supplies be conserved for emergency use.

"* * * We suggest study of the question whether tariffs on some of these minerals may be advantageously reduced or rescinded, in return for trading advantages from the countries controlling these supplies."

As to the importance of the manganese industry as a factor in providing increased employment for labor, I may refer you to the Department's press release of February 9, 1935, a copy of which is enclosed. As is pointed out therein, the total number of wage earners engaged in mining manganese ores in 1929 was, according to census data, only 354. Although labor has little reason to expect that a restoration of the excessively high duty on manganese will relieve to any appreciable extent the pressure of unemployment, it may, on the other hand, expect to obtain substantial benefits from the development of our export trade with the Soviet Union, which as a result of the agreement entered into with the United States on July 13, 1935, amounted to $31,076,007 for the 10-month period from July 1, 1935, to April 30, 1936, and from the development of our export trade with Brazil, which in 1929 was valued at $108,787,000.

In view of the facts presented above, it does not appear that action to withhold from the Soviet Union the duty reduction on manganese or to abrogate the Brazilian agreement in order to restore the former rate of duty on that product would be in the interests of national security or the employment of labor.

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS B. SAYRE,
Assistant Secretary
(For the Secretary of State).

AMERICAN MANGANESE PRODUCERS ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., July 28, 1936.

Hon. FRANCIS B. SAYRE,
Assistant Secretary of State, Department of State,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SAYRE: Your letter of July 9 received in response to our letter of June 9 to the Secretary of State regarding the Russian trade agreement.

You state that the Russian trade agreement "was not concluded under the authority of the Trade Agreements Act." May we ask under what authority it was concluded?

The Constitution provides that agreement or treaties with foreign countries are subject to approval by two-thirds majority of the Senate. The Trade Agreements Act was not approved by two-thirds majority of the Senate. The individual trade agreements have not been approved by two-thirds of the Senate. Now, in addition, the Russian trade agreement, concluded separately without notice and hearing, appears in violation of the Constitution as an illegal and unauthorized document.

You state that "Inasmuch as the trade-agreements program is based upon the principle of most-favored-nation treatment, it was not intended that Brazil should as a result of the trade agreement be given a preferential advantage in the American market with respect to manganese ore or any other commodity." In view of this we cannot understand in what manner Brazil enjoys any special advantage not granted other nations under the reciprocal-trade agreement and why, therefore, the agreement should not be abrogated.

We cannot accept your statement to the effect that "there is no evidence to indicate that Brazil has not fulfilled the obligations which it has undertaken as a result of its trade agreement with the United States." We suggest your analysis of the Brazilian-German trade agreement recently negotiated. It should be the duty of our Government to recognize discriminations by foreign countries made against American interests in the face of trade agreements. In the absence of action by the Department, it becomes the duty of American citizens to assemble and place this evidence before the proper authorities and move for complete abrogation of such treaties.

It is most unfortunate that manganese producers have never been given proper notice or hearing under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, in accordance with your testimony before Congress and in accordance with the law embodied in the act.

Had proper hearings been held, you would not have included in your letter the erroneous representation that "the total number of wage earners engaged in mining manganese ores in 1929 was, according to census data, only 354."

Proper hearings would have revealed that most of the manganese mines are located in rural and mountainous areas, and the wage earners engaged are mostly native laborers drawn from the surrounding communities. Most of such employees own or rent their small individual farms and engage in light farming. Under a census enumeration these men would be classified as farmers. The same is true of contractors, haulers, millmen, woodsmen, and most other employees in manganese operations.

In the Batesville district of Arkansas alone, for instance, more than 300 families normally obtain their subsistence from manganese operations. A small farm acreage is leased to the local farmer, and the individual farmer, with his family, digs the manganese ore from this acreage. Census classifies him as a farmer.

In Butte, Mont., where the largest producing manganese operations in the United States are located, the mines produce lead, zinc, and other minerals, as well as manganese. When the producers are free from unfair foreign competition and have orders for manganese they mine manganese, otherwise they mine other minerals. They, too, in the 1929 census enumeration would be classified as miners of ores other than manganese.

For your information we enclose a photostat copy of a page from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 11, 1935, showing statements on the floor of the House by Congressmen from a few manganese States, indicating the employment in 1929 of more than 2,400 men in the production of manganese and manganiferous ores. We call your particular attention to the statement of one of the Congressmen, with special reference to previous statements of the Secretary of State relative to the number of men employed in manganese, as follows: "I may also suggest to the Secretary of State that hereafter he get his information from more reliable sources."

Reference to the United States Bureau of Mines bulletin would have shown the State Department that in 1929 there was a total number of 63 manganese operations actually underway in 17 States. Any one of a number of manganese districts in the United States employed more men than the total credited by you for the entire country.

If the normal domestic market is made available to domestic producers, the total sale value, based on average 1924–28 prices of high-grade manganese ores alone (700,000 tons of 50-percent Mn), delivered at the furnaces or consuming points, would be in excess of $21,000,000. More than half of this amount, or $12,000,000, would represent wages. Allowing $1,000 per man per year, it would mean the employment of approximately 12,000 men per year.

According to Vandegrift's survey in Utah, a man employed in the mining and metallurgical industry will support a total population of approximately 15 people (including workmen's families and the service population). On this basis, the employment of 12,000 men in producing manganese ores in mining sections would support an additional population of 180,000 people. We do not contend that this could be brought about suddenly, but it does not appear that these facts have been considered in your deliberations.

If proper manganese hearings had been held, you would have learned that in 1928 no Government agency credited the State of South Dakota with a single ton of manganese ore, but that in 1930, after exhaustive surveys and reports, the United States Geological Survey formally reported a positive reserve in this one State alone of 102,000,000 tons of metallic manganese, equivalent to more than 500,000,000 tons of manganese ore running from 15 to 18 percent metallic manganese. This is only 1 State, and there are more than 30 States containing manganese deposits of varying extent. Furthermore, since the Brazilian treaty was signed, the United States Bureau of Mines has announced a new process whereby pure manganese may be recovered from ores running from 10 to 15 percent metallic manganese.

It is important to note that during the year 1931, without recognition of Russia and without reciprocal-trade agreements, the United States exports to Russia amounted to $103,717,000. The average of the years 1926–30 was $77,666,000. In 1936, with recognition and with reciprocal-trade agreements, the United States is surrendering revenue, sacrificing national defense, and giving valuable concessions to obtain from the soviets an agreement that they will purchase from us a total of $30,000,000.

In view of these facts, and since no proper hearings on manganese have been held, manganese producers, property owners, and employees in the industry respectfully but determinedly insist on the termination of the Brazilian, Russian, and Canadian trade agreements.

Respectfully yours,

J. CARSON ADKERSON, President.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 11, 1936.

Mr. J. CARSON ADKERSON,
President, American Manganese Producers Association,
National Press Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ADKERSON: Your letter of July 28, 1936, addressed to Mr. Sayre, who is on vacation, concerning further the reduction of the duty on manganese with reference to our trade agreements with Brazil and Canada and our commercial agreement with the Soviet Union, has been received. The expression of your views is very much appreciated, and I assure you that your letter has been read with interest.

In response to your inquiry regarding the authority under which the Soviet agreement of July 13, 1935, was concluded, it may be pointed out that the agreement was concluded by the President in pursuance of his general powers under the Constitution to conduct the foreign relations of the United States. The Soviet agreement is only one of a number of executive agreements which have been negotiated by various Presidents in pursuance of such powers to prevent discrimination against American commerce or to bring about a change in acts or policies which are prejudicial to it.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY C. HAWKINS,
Chief, Division of Trade Agreements.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may insert a letter in the RECORD?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GURNEY. I yield for that purpose only.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted at this point in the RECORD a letter written by me, addressed to the Honorable R. R. Rose, Democratic State chairman of the State of Wyoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 29, 1940.

Hon. R. R. ROSE,
Democratic State Chairman,
Casper, Wyo.

DEAR BOB: Answering your telegram of today, I write for the purpose of explaining the votes I shall cast on the matter now before the Senate.

I do not discuss the purely legal or constitutional questions involved.

The distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee quoted testimony before his committee to the effect that representatives of western livestock, farm, and ranchmen had admitted present trade pacts had not hurt us, but that these men of the West are fearful of what may happen under trade pacts to be made in the future.

There are two reasons accounting for that fear: The 1936 agreement with Canada was followed by another in 1939 increasing the quotas and further lowering the rates on livestock imports; and the nature of the campaign of fear for the future now being made by Republican politicians in and out of the livestock and farm organizations in the Western States.

As to the two Canadian agreements:

Under the 1936 agreement with Canada, the United States tariff on live cattle, weighing 700 pounds or more each, was reduced from 3 to 2 cents per pound, subject to a quota of 156,000 head. This quota was about 1 percent of the average annual slaughter of cattle in the United States. There was complaint under this quota that sudden shifts in market price brought in large percentage of the cattle at one time, thus adversely affecting the prices of American cattle at or en route to American stockyards.

The 1939 agreement provides for a tariff rate of 1½ cents per pound on an increased quota of 225,000 head (the 1936 quota was 156,000 head). The number entering during any one quarter of the year is now limited to 60,000 head from all foreign sources. The new quota represents about 1⅛ percent of the average annual slaughter of cattle and calves in the United States.

In 1936 the tariff on calves weighing less than 175 pounds each was reduced from 2½ cents per pound under the Smoot-Hawley Act to 1½ cents on a quota of 52,000 head. Under the 1939 agreement the same rate of tariff is continued, but the quota is raised to 100,000 head, and the weight limit is raised from 175 pounds to 200 pounds per head.

Beef cattle and calves in excess of the quotas provided for in the agreement must pay the full 1930 rate of tariff.

On page 161 of Foreign Crops and Markets, issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, February 10, 1940, the United States average farm price of beef cattle, 1935–39 is given. It is apparent that increased imports of cattle in 1939 did not depress prices.

In 1939 cattle prices were the highest since 1930, except in 1937 (when imports also were large).

Farm cash income by American producers from the marketing of cattle and calves from 1935 (the last year before the first agreement with Canada went into effect) through 1938, is as follows:

Farm cash income from cattle

Year:
1935	$1,061,830,000
1936	1,097,767,000
1937	1,214,699,000
1938	1,114,340,000

Statistics thus far available indicate that the farm cash income from cattle in 1939 will be larger than any other year since 1929.

I quote a sample of the fear campaign now being conducted in Wyoming. Recently there has been published in the newspapers of Wyoming lengthy quotations from the remarks made by Congressman HORTON in his speech in the House as it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 21. I quote from page 1808. Says Congressman HORTON:

"I will confine my remarks largely to the livestock interests, and I will not burden you with a lot of statistics, for already your head, like mine, is chuck full of figures and counterfigures. All one has to do is first determine where you want to go and figures can be dug up and juggled in such a way to land you there safely."

Mr. HORTON, having determined where he wishes to go, then proceeds to juggle his figures. He is speaking of the effect on cattle of the present Canadian trade pact. I quote further:

"Try as you will, juggle your figures as you may, use all the cunning of your New Deal methods, you will never convince a single hard-headed cattleman that lowering of the duty on cattle, which made possible ever-increasing imports—which in 1939 reached 753,570 live head—has done him anything but dirt."

Did lowering the rates under the quotas provided in the Canadian pacts make possible the 753,570 imports in 1939?

Let us look at the Department of Agriculture statistical publication Foreign Crops and Markets of date February 10, 1940. At page 160 there is given the United States imports of dutiable cattle from Canada and Mexico, 1935–39. I quote only 1939. It will be borne in mind that cattle of 700 pounds and over come in under the trade agreements, while cattle under 700 pounds come in under the rate fixed in the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930. Under the trade agreements we imported from Canada 181,323 head, of which 8,570 head were dairy cattle and 172,753 head were beef cattle and others. From Mexico we imported under the trade pacts 55,232 head. Thus there was imported under the agreements a total of about 240,985 head of beef cattle in 1939.

Under the Smoot-Hawley rates we imported in 1939 from Canada 11,229 head and from Mexico 390,074 head.

It will be seen that over half of the total imports referred to by Congressman HORTON as chargeable to the trade agreements came into the United States from Mexico under the Smoot-Hawley tariff rates. And let it be said this 390,074 head of cattle weighing less than 700 pounds was mostly thin stock headed for ranches and feed lots of American cattle producers.

Of calves, 200 pounds or less weight, under the trade pact we imported in 1939 from Canada 69,464 head, and from Mexico 30,536 head—the full quota of 100,000 under the 1939 pact. In addition we imported in 1939 some 15,000 head of calves under the Smoot-Hawley Act, 1930, rate of 2½ cents per pound.

Some of our wool growers are also fearful of future trade-agreement pacts. Their representatives admit generally that trade pacts have not directly affected the prices of raw wool, but they point out that when notices of negotiations for pacts were announced these notices did, temporarily, unsettle the market to their damage.

While our critics are damning the New Deal as affecting livestock and wool—major industries in Wyoming—let us not forget that while the Smoot-Hawley Act rates were in force in 1932 beef steers fell to 4½ to 5 cents on the ranch, and today ranch prices have practically doubled. Also, in 1932 wool sold in Wyoming from 6 to 8 cents. Since then prices of wool have tripled. Only last week a 200,000 pound clip in the neighboring State of Montana sold for 30 cents. We hope for and need still further advances in the price of both cattle and wool. I do not claim that the low prices in 1932 and 1933 were due largely to the Smoot-Hawley Act rates of duty on cattle and wool. Neither do I contend that New Deal legislation is to be credited 100 percent for our better times and better prices; but I am weary of hearing that the New Deal has not helped the people of my State.

In conclusion, let me say that I do not believe the present treaty pacts have been harmful to Wyoming.

From many letters and telegrams from my constituents—many of whom I personally know and highly regard—it is evident they fear further additional modification of the 1939 Canadian trade pact or from new pacts with a further lowering of rates and increase of quotas.

In these circumstances, while I do not subscribe to all the fears expressed by my friends, nor to those conjured by political opponents of my party, I shall vote for the amendment offered by Senator O'MAHONEY. I cannot vote for the Pittman amendment.

It is my conviction the general reciprocal trade program has given great aid toward solidifying friendship among the nations of the western hemisphere; that it makes for continued peace for the United States; that its continuance will help to keep us out of war, and will strengthen the arms of the President and the Secretary of State to hasten world peace on a basis of reason and justice. Because I hate war, because I could never bring myself to do any act which, in my conscience and conviction, might lessen our determination to keep American boys from slaughter on the fields of battle, or our women and children and our civilian population from possible mass destruction by enemy bombers, I make my choice.

Very sincerely,

HARRY H. SCHWARTZ.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, the spring of 1940 has started off in my section of the country very auspiciously. I notice on the weather map today that again we are favored with a heavy rain, and I am sure that, due to the fact that we have had rain for the last month, and are continuing to have rain, our people at home are feeling rather optimistic. They feel that this will be a good year. They feel that they will be able to raise something this year. Therefore they want to be sure that they are going to get their share of the United States market. So, because of these prospects, I am going definitely to oppose the extension of the authority to negotiate trade treaties. I may say, further, that I am going to vote for the amendment which has been offered seeking to bring all trade treaties back to the Senate for ratification by this body.

Mr. President, in discussing the reciprocal trade treaties I should like to call to the attention of this body that, in addition to the question of the constitutionality of reciprocal trade treaties, they have definitely adversely affected our national economy. I submit that, as an elective representative of the people of South Dakota, I feel I have no right to grant a blank check to the State Department, to barter the rights of these people away as the State Department may see fit.

I further submit that it is my opinion that Congress has no right to grant to the State Department the authority to raise and lower tariffs, which, in reality, is the authority to impose taxes. It would be equally as logical to grant to the Treasury authority to change, without consulting Congress, the tax laws of the land as it is to grant authority to the State Department to make trade treaties.

However, in my opinion, probably the most dangerous effect of the reciprocal-trade policy has been the disastrous results which have been imposed upon our American raw-material producers.

There seems to have been developed in this country a philosophy that foreign trade is a cure-all for both domestic and world problems. It is even contended by the Secretary of State that the extension of foreign trade is in the interest of world peace, and is the means of restoring world prosperity among the various nations. If this is the case, it has certainly failed to date. If we stop but a minute to analyze this philosophy, we find how utterly false it is.

I grant that the securing of new outlets and new industrial uses for our products is desirable, but have we not been overemphasizing the value of foreign trade and belittling our own local market? What is the situation today?

Foreign farm products have been coming in to establish credits with which to buy implements of death. American manufacturers of war materials have had the benefit of the increase in exports, and American farmers have been deprived of that part of the domestic market for all the foodstuffs we have imported.

Here is how I tie up farm imports with war materials exported. I do it by just looking at the other side of the picture. What did we export and who received the benefit of increases in trade?

Exports of scrap iron jumped from $112,000,000 in 1936 to $300,000,000 in 1937, and constituted 9.1 percent of all exports. Shipments of machinery essential in the manufacture of armaments increased from $335,000,000 in 1936 to $479,000,000 in 1937.

Whatever purpose may have induced the present administration to allow huge imports of farm products during recent years, the actual effect of these policies has been to provide the means whereby foreign nations could pay for war materials purchased in America. These war materials have been paid for largely from the sale of farm products which directly compete with those produced by the American farmer.

Much as I dislike figures in any talk, I must give a few just to prove my point. The record speaks for itself. Here they are, covering imports directly competitive with Northwest farmers: In 1937, 86,000,000 bushels of corn were imported; 9 years ago, only one-third of a million. In 1937, 494,000 head of cattle were imported, while in 1932 only 97,000 were imported. How about hogs? In 1937 foreigners shipped us sixteen and one-half million pounds, while during 1932 only 34,000 pounds were allowed to come in. In 1932, 1,000,000 pounds of foreign butter were consumed by the citizens of the United States; in 1937 over 11,000,000 pounds. In our most prosperous years foreign trade constituted but 6 percent of our total commerce, and this 6 percent was only obtained at the expense of some of our American industries and raw-material producers. I wish to qualify this and further remarks by the statement that I except those raw materials in which we are deficient in this country.

Obviously, the expansion of American foreign trade can only be accomplished in one of three ways: First, by the acceptance of gold in payment; second, by the loan to foreign countries; third, by the acceptance of goods in kind.

As we well know, the payment of gold is practically an impossibility under the present world situation, as we already have accumulated a stock of gold which is embarrassing us, to say the least.

I believe any Member of this body would certainly hesitate to recommend further credits to foreign countries for the stimulation of our foreign trade, as many of our unpaid foreign loans are the result of such a policy in years gone by.

This brings us to the one and only means of stimulating foreign trade; namely, the acceptance of goods in kind. I have previously stated that I am excepting those goods in which we have a deficiency in this country and which are, in the majority of instances, strategic materials. The whole theory of reciprocal-trade treaties if based upon granting concessions in the importation of certain goods from certain countries, in return for like concessions in these countries, on goods of American manufacture or for our raw materials. It has turned out, as the reciprocal-trade treaties have operated, that this is primarily a concession to one line of industry at the expense of another. But the worst part of it is, that the producers of raw materials have been the ones who have been called upon to give the subsidy to the manufacturing industries of this country, notwithstanding the fact that it is the producers of raw materials who have been worst hit during the years of depression, and for whom we have been compelled to vote the greatest amount of assistance.

Now let us look at the proposition of reciprocal-trade treaties which directly affect the farmers of the Middle West. One of the big deals of the New Deal is the reciprocal trade treaty policy. These treaties, combined with the plan of Government at present to reduce production of agricultural crops, has left the farmer in an impossible situation. He has had to compete with other countries which can produce crops such as he produces at a less cost than he can under the present administration's farm plan. The farmers of our country were not told that there would be imports of agricultural crops equaling the normal production of the acres ordered to lay idle in order to reduce surplus, and that these imports would go into competition with the lesser crop the farmer would be permitted to grow. The result, in my opinion, has been that it is impossible for the farmer of the United States to come anywhere near getting cost of production.

Another result of the reciprocal-trade policy has been a tremendous increase in imports of agricultural commodities into this country, adding to the wealth of the farmers' competitors in foreign lands at the expense of the farmers and all the rest of the citizens in the agricultural States of these United States.

To satisfy myself, I have just checked up on the latest report issued by the United States Department of Commerce, released March 1, 1940. That report shows that imports of competitive and substitute farm products during the last 6 months of 1938 amounted to approximately $479,000,000, and they have kept on increasing, for during the last 6 months of 1939 they amounted to approximately $528,000,000. Comparing farm exports for the same period in 1938, I find that these exports amounted to $414,000,000, but for the same period in 1939 there is a decrease in exports of $28,000,000 below the 1938 period.

Bringing this information a little more up to date, I find that, during the first month of this year, agricultural imports amounted to seventy-five and one-half million dollars, against forty-two and one-half million dollars for January a year ago.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GURNEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if he is not aware that in testimony before the Senate Finance Committee, at pages 651 to 659, the Secretary of the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation pointed out a significant part of the cost to which the Senator has just alluded, namely, that in terms of our trade in the year 1938 his study showed that we gave to foreign countries concessions on $561,734,000 more goods than we received. On duty reductions alone we came out in the red to the extent of $70,420,000.

Mr. GURNEY. I knew that the balance was against us, but I did not know the exact figures, and I thank the Senator for supplying them.

A very striking example of the effect of these reciprocal-trade treaties is the rapid growth of the cotton-raising industry in South America, where nations have grown wealthy on markets that were once the exclusive markets of the cotton planter in the southern part of the United States. In a lesser sense the same thing has taken place with corn, hogs, wheat, barley, and all of the rest of our agricultural crops. Are we going to continue along these lines and sacrifice our own markets in the United States to foreign invasion because a generous National Government feels that it is the nice thing to do? After all, any government should look after its own people first. That may sound selfish, but it is practical common sense.

The administration has told us that this has been absolutely necessary in order to build up our foreign trade so that we may have a market for our excess production, but in actual effect it has built up the foreigner's market in this country so that he has an outlet not only for his excess production but for his entire crop at much better prices than he was able to get elsewhere. Perhaps it looked like a good plan when it started, but now when it so certainly is not a good plan, why should it be continued?

It is to the best interests of the farmer, the labor unions, the small merchants, and the common laborers that authority for these trade treaties be not continued, for the reason that these classes of our people produce only for the domestic market, and because it is to their interests to build up America before undertaking to salvage the economy of the world.

The whole Hull policy is plainly designed to let in raw materials, thereby injuring the economy of 40 out of our 48 States. These incoming raw materials can only be liquidated with the exports from favored industries, and I use this word "favored" advisedly, because these trade treaties are protecting the very interests that stand charged by the administration with having engaged in nefarious practices to put through the tariff schedules contained in former tariff bills.

The farm plan of the present administration kisses the farmer's cheek with the soil benefit check, that he grow less, and slaps his other cheek with free trade in agricultural products. The great American market—half the market of the world—is thrown open to peon-labor-produced crops from foreign countries, sent in to compete with the American farmer, rightfully entitled to the American standard of living.

While the administration rightfully curses sweatshop and child labor in American factories, yet by its free-trade policy, these reciprocal-trade treaties, with their most-favored-nation clauses, compel the American farmer to compete with the low-paid sweatshop and child labor in the fields of other countries.

The policy pursued by the administration has been directed at raising American costs, as evidenced by the debasement of our dollar, the reduction in hours of labor and increased hourly rates of pay, and increased taxation. I am not at this time discussing the merits of these policies, but I do wish to emphasize that while the administration has been raising the cost of American production in trying to create a more abundant life, the very countries which they propose, through these reciprocal-trade treaties, to put in direct competition with our producers, have been lowering their standards of living, and it is this competition which they ask the producers of America to compete against.

It is apparent that there is an inconsistency in policy, with the administration on one hand raising the cost of production in this country and on the other hand encouraging importation of foreign goods produced under a continuously lower standard of living.

In practically all cases when trade treaties are discussed, generalities are dealt with; but I wish to show by one specific case that they accomplish little, if anything, in the interest of the American producers.

Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, in attempting to justify the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, testified before the Senate Finance Committee on February 26, 1940, as follows:

> In the trade agreements we have made some limited reductions in duties on certain products. So carefully have these adjustments been made and so painstakingly have they been safeguarded wherever need for safeguards was demonstrated, that these duty reductions have not inflicted any injury on any group of producers. No satisfactory evidence to the contrary has been brought forward—for the simple reason that no injury to our producers has, in fact, occurred.

I propose to show that this statement is contrary to the facts; and in proof I wish to submit a specific case. The one I have in mind is manganese, which is of particular importance to the State which I represent, and, in fact, to the United States as a whole, as evidenced from the following statements made by the War Department.

Hon. Frederick H. Payne, Assistant Secretary of War, said on November 10, 1930:

> Of the raw materials necessary to us in war, none is more important than manganese. The problem of providing an adequate supply is aggravated by the fact that we largely rely upon foreign sources to meet our demands in this material. Consequently, it is easy to see why we are so interested in the activities of the American Manganese Producers Association. (Convention proceedings, A. M. P. A., November 10, 1930.)

Maj. Alfred H. Hobley, expert in charge of Raw Materials Division of War Department, said:

> In the case of shortage of shipping or enemy interference with shipping, volume becomes a matter of considerable importance. There is, of course, a great difference in the volume of the various essential raw materials. In the case of platinum, for instance, enough could be brought into the country in a trunk to last almost a year. In the case of manganese, the annual domestic consumption is in the neighborhood of 700,000 to 800,000 tons of ore, which would require considerable shipping capacity. * * * (Convention proceedings, American Manganese Producers Association, November 10, 1930.)

The present situation in the manganese industry is well explained on page 43 of the published Army Extension Course, 1931 edition, Industrial Mobilization Plans, prepared by the War Department, which summarizes the domestic manganese industry as follows:

In spite of all handicaps, however, enough interest has been stimulated to result in the creation of a capacity much larger than indicated by annual domestic production and a readiness for expansion that is a decidedly important military asset.

Maj. Alfred H. Hobley, speaking in behalf of the War Department before the American Manganese Producers Association convention on November 10, 1930, made the following statement:

After considering all possible solutions to the manganese problem, it appears that one of the safest methods from the standpoint of production in wartime is the development of the domestic industry to the point where it would be in existence and offer a satisfactory nucleus for expansion to the necessary degree to meet the increased needs that might arise as a result of military activity. To a certain extent this is what the domestic manganese producers have been trying to do, and in which they have encountered considerable difficulty and resistance.

I also wish to quote the President himself, from his message to Congress on the 2d day of March 1934, requesting trade-treaty legislation, in which he said:

You and I know, too, that it is important that the country possess within its borders a necessary diversity and balance to maintain a rounded national life; that it must sustain activities vital to national defense, and that such interests cannot be sacrificed for passing advantage.

I have shown the importance of manganese to American industry, and particularly in terms of national defense, recognized by both the War Department and the President himself; but in order that the Members of the Senate may have a complete background of what this industry involves, I shall briefly describe it.

DESCRIPTION OF INDUSTRY

Manganese is classed as an essential war mineral; but also no mineral is of greater importance to the material welfare of the Nation in time of peace. Our steel industry could not operate without manganese. Repeated attempts have been made in this country and abroad to substitute other materials, but always without success. Even Germany, lacking an adequate supply of manganese within her own borders during the Great War, kept her steel furnaces alive only because she managed at tremendous cost to obtain the element by reworking old slags and former waste products. Outside of steel making, manganese has other uses which are vital to the military security of the country, notably as an essential ingredient of dry batteries used in flashlights and signaling apparatus. It is used in paints as a drier, and to some extent as a pigment, and it enters into various useful chemicals, including potassium permanganate. By far the main use, however, is in steel manufacture. In the United States the iron and steel industry normally consumes the equivalent of 750,000 out of a total of some 800,000 tons of manganese ore used annually.

For use in steel making manganese is ordinarily first made into the form of ferromanganese, an alloy containing about 79 percent of manganese, the remainder being iron, carbon, and a small amount of impurities.

I call attention particularly to the figures of imports for consumption in 1936, amounting to more than 800,000 tons of high-grade manganese ore and low-grade ores in increasing monthly amounts. Page 301 of Manganese and Manganiferous Ores, 1929, United States Bureau of Mines, shows that in 1929 we used 1,059,178 tons of high-grade manganese ore, or the equivalent in low-grade ores.

The mining of manganiferous iron ores is only one phase of the manganese industry, but normally it results in payments to the miners of the Lake Superior region amounting to practically $4,000,000 annually, and approximately the same amount is distributed to transportation companies for carrying the ore from the Minnesota ranges to the furnaces in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Illinois. Imports of foreign manganese ores and alloys serve to replace corresponding tonnage of domestic ores and to throw out of work a corresponding number of American workmen.

In 1922 Congress provided a duty of 1 cent per pound on metallic manganese contained in ores running above 30 percent metallic manganese. Production of domestic ore was retarded through the refusal of certain major steel companies to buy domestic ore even at prices less than were being paid for foreign ores of similar grade. Production was further retarded through the importation duty free of ores running slightly under 30 percent manganese. In 1930 the 1-cent tariff was extended to cover ore running above 10 percent manganese. On account of the depressed condition of the market since 1930, the full beneficial effect of this duty was never felt.

Because of the fact that manganese tops the list as the No. 1 strategic war mineral essential to our national defense, and because the development and maintenance of a domestic industry is of such vital importance both to our peacetime and wartime requirements, let us examine exactly how the industry has been treated under the reciprocal-trade program of this administration.

The following table shows the imports of manganese ore into the United States from both Brazil and Russia for the years 1932 to 1939, inclusive. Those two countries are used because they supply a substantial part of our manganese requirements and because I wish to discuss the treaties with those two countries.

[1] Preliminary figures for 1939.

One of the earlier trade treaties was effected with Brazil; and manganese was included in this treaty as one of the commodities on which Brazil was granted a 50-percent tariff reduction. In reference to this concession to Brazil, I wish to quote from page 483 of Minerals Yearbook, 1935, prepared and published under the direction of Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior:

On February 2, 1935, the United States and Brazil signed a reciprocal-trade agreement which, among other concessions, provided for a reduction of 50 percent in the present American duty on manganese ore imported from Brazil. If confined to Brazil, the lowered duty will inevitably stimulate production there. If, however, the reduction in duty is granted other nations supplying the American market, Brazil will have no competitive advantage due to the agreement.

That is exactly what happened. Unfortunately for Brazil, the reduction in duty on manganese was not confined to Brazil and was extended to Russia. It will readily be seen from the above table of imports from Brazil and Russia that any advantage pertaining to Brazil was quickly canceled, and that in reality Russia gained the advantage from the Brazilian treaty.

This is a typical example of one country being granted a concession, only to allow another country to come through the back door and nullify the original treaty.

But the point which I wish to make is that the net result of the reduction of the tariff on manganese to Brazil has been to throttle the domestic production of manganese, and to deprive the United States Government of over $18,000,000 in duties which has, in actuality, been a subsidy of this amount to the United States steel industry.

I should like also to call attention to the fact that this action has been taken in the face of requests by the War and Navy Departments for appropriations totaling millions of dollars for the purchase of stock piles of strategic materials essential in the conduct of war, and of the millions of dollars which have been appropriated and spent, something like ten or fifteen million dollars have been used in the purchase of manganese.

In other words, here is a specific example of a reciprocal-trade treaty accomplishing nothing except to subsidize the steel industry to the extent of $18,000,000, at the expense of the domestic manganese industry, and in face of the fact that we are spending millions of dollars in acquiring this strategic material in the interests of national defense.

I feel this fully answers Mr. Hull's contention that reciprocal-trade treaties have hurt no one; and if no satisfactory evidence to the contrary has been brought forward, it is for the simple reason that the State Department has refused to recognize any criticisms of their reciprocal-tariff program.

Mr. President, my State of South Dakota needs industry, as other States need more industry. We need expansion in industry tremendously, in order to give honest employment to our idle citizens. In South Dakota is a great undeveloped supply of manganese ore. Surveys show 100,000,000 tons of manganese deposits—sufficient to supply our own peacetime steel industry for a period of 100 years. All that is necessary to have a wonderful development there is a stable governmental policy. It needs only a fair tariff protection in order to be developed and make jobs. Its development will go almost all the way in solving the problem of where we are to get that No. 1 strategic mineral—manganese

The immediate effect of the reciprocal trade treaty policy has been to discourage development of manganese ores, not only in South Dakota but in all other States. Following the good-neighbor policy through the trade treaties, Brazil was given the concession of a 50-percent reduction in the manganese tariff. Undoubtedly the producers of manganese in Brazil were as jubilant as the owners in this country of the undeveloped manganese resources were depressed when this concession was made. However, I am sure that the Brazilian producers are not so jubilant now because their exports to the United States have had to compete with manganese exports from other countries, such as Russia, where manganese can be produced cheaper, and Brazil has lost the market they thought they were going to get. And all because of the reductions in the tariff on manganese originally made in the Brazilian trade treaty which went into effect in January 1936, South Dakota and other States do not now have an industry that could be employing thousands of men and paying millions of dollars in taxes and pay rolls each year. Our domestic manganese industry is undeveloped and the reciprocal trade treaty policy is responsible for that condition.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. GURNEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the distinguished Senator from South Dakota about the bearing of his theory upon labor. Looking into the future not far away and imagining a country in competition with us in the production of manganese and other products of mines, imagining a country where labor is all commanded by the government, where no laborer can afford to leave his job because he knows he will starve if he does not continue to work for his government, I ask the Senator of what avail will trade treaties which cut down existing tariffs 50 percent be to protect our miners against the competition of men who have to obey and who cannot have anything to say about their standard of wages or diet or clothing or shelter?

Mr. GURNEY. I thank the Senator. Unquestionably trade treaties would afford no protection, but on the contrary would reduce employment in this country, because any mineral can be produced cheaper in countries where labor is corralled and made to work.

Mr. President, I wish to hurry along because other Senators desire to speak, and I have a few remarks yet to make.

In my remarks I have simply tried to show that the reciprocal-trade treaties run contrary to the interests of this country.

Because of their definite effect on our national economy, we have heard so much discussion of these treaties that I felt it would be well to bring out a specific case which I have attempted to do in this instance, namely, manganese. The development of this domestic industry has unquestionably been hurt by reciprocal treaties, irrespective of the statement made by Mr. Hull.

I have quoted statements from the War Department and the President himself, showing the importance of manganese to national defense. I have also included a brief description of the industry, which may serve as a background for any action taken by the Senate. In this particular case, it is obvious that nothing was accomplished by the Brazilian treaty and, in fact, Russia was the one who gained, at the expense of the domestic producer and the United States Treasury, and of Brazil.

In conclusion, let me quote from information contained in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Finance, which has been studying the question of continuing the authority as expressed in Joint Resolution 407 now before us. I find on pages 467 and 470 the following:

All that the United States now needs to solve its problem of manganese for national defense is the installation and maintenance of additional processing plants. This can and will be done by the industry if a fair market is made available to domestic producers. However, unless the industry is stabilized by adequate tariff protection, a temporary increase in price would not warrant additional major investments, and therefore additional plants with a substantial increase in production could not be expected.

Continuing the quotation:

COOPERATION

Congress has repeatedly expressed its will and intent to encourage the further development of the manganese resources of the Nation, but it is to be regretted that full cooperation from the administrative arm of the Government has not yet been forthcoming.

Continuing on page 470:

A stock pile of 1,000,000 tons of manganese has been recommended. Even such a stock pile still will not assure the country adequate security as no one can foretell how long an emergency will last. Domestic mines cannot in a short period of time, ordinarily allowed in an emergency, produce sufficient to meet the demands. It requires time to carry forward development work underground and install the necessary plants.

And here are the conclusions, continuing the quotation:

CONCLUSIONS

Through the reduction in the manganese ore duty in the trade agreement with Brazil, our country since 1936 has lost in revenue $18,422,320, which was formerly enjoyed by the United States Treasury. This loss will continue to increase. In addition, since 1936, we have sacrificed the continued development of our own manganese resources for national defense. To cover up this mistake, the strategic-materials bill was passed by Congress, authorizing the appropriation and expenditure of $100,000,000 over a 4-year period for the purchase and stock pile of strategic minerals of which manganese is the major item. Even the Strategic Materials Act will not solve the manganese problem. In an emergency, such as we may now be facing, domestic mines will still have to be put into operation. It is possible we have waited too long already. This is indicated by the results of the recent repeated Government calls for bids for manganese ore under the Strategic Materials Act. To date only one small order of 25,000 tons has actually been contracted for. The results of the bids indicate that a sufficient quantity of the grade of ore called for by the Government is not readily available from foreign or domestic sources. Our country has the reserves of ore, the labor, and the capital. However, it cannot be expected that substantial investments in additional developments and milling plants will be made until assurances are given that the domestic production will be protected against future importations of manganese ores from Soviet Russia, produced by Communist and forced labor where cost means nothing, or ores from India which are mined by labor paid the equivalent of 1½ cents per hour. Restoration of the tariff to a parity basis with steel is necessary to help stabilize the manganese industry on a basis similar to that enjoyed by steel.

Continuing the quotation, here are the recommendations:

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE

1. Restore the duty

Terminate or modify the trade agreement with Brazil so that the manganese ore duty may be established on a parity basis with steel products. This will, prior to the date of restoration, encourage and permit importers to store within the United States, under the present reduced rate of duty, all manganese ores they can find available in the world's markets and thereby force the formation of a stock pile at no cost to the Government.

At the same time it will encourage and permit domestic producers to immediately make additional investments, carry forward development work, install additional plants, and increase production to help take care of the needs of the United States at no cost to the Government.

2. Stock pile

If a Government-owned stock pile is considered advisable, then let appropriations be made under the Strategic Materials Act for the Government to purchase and store manganese ores exclusively of domestic origin during such periods when prices are low and no other outlets for the ore are available, thus encouraging further developments and maintaining a healthy nucleus of a manganese industry within the United States ready for expanded production to meet the needs in an emergency.

These recommendations may be carried out and results obtained in accordance with the will of Congress and at no ultimate cost to the Government, provided that existing and future trade agreements are made subject to the approval of the Senate.

Mr. President, I want to read now a resolution adopted by the Land O'Lakes Creameries, Inc., of Minnesota. This is a great cooperative, built by the dairy farmers of Minnesota, and the resolution I refer to was adopted at its recent annual meeting:

While reciprocal-trade treaties can be made a valuable asset in establishing trade relations between the United States and foreign countries, they can likewise become a national liability if they are not made in conformity with the principles we have established for the American standard of living, which cannot be maintained unless we protect the American producer and the American worker against the competition of low-paid foreign labor and depreciated foreign currencies which permit of lower costs of production.

We are not opposed to the principles of trade treaties if such agreements, when consummated, deal with such items of production or manufacture which we do not produce at all or cannot produce within the economics of our American standard of living or when such treaties do not affect parity price levels as compared with this standard.

We believe that the trade agreements already entered into and those contemplated by the Federal Government are and will be of further detriment, particularly to the dairy, livestock, and poultry producers. The progressive reduction of duties on these items threatens not only to limit the opportunities for American farmers to find markets in the United States but to force a minimum rate of income to these producers far below the needs of farmers if they are to have anything that approaches a rightful share of the national income.

Prices of domestic products can never be higher at any time than the international price plus the "tariff wall." We protest against our interests being traded off for the benefit of a few large industries, such as the automotive, chemical, machinery, and other groups in order to enable such industries to increase their exports. We believe it is a short-sighted policy for these groups to support the downward revision through reciprocal-trade treaties of tariffs on agricultural products because of the fact that their increased exports under these arrangements will nowhere equal the increased demand for their manufactured products on the part of American farmers if they have parity prices with which to purchase these items.

We urge the Senators, Representatives, executive and administrative departments of our National Government to recognize and adhere to the aforesaid principles with respect to trade treaties and that full hearings be given to the spokesmen for agricultural commodities affected in any way by treaty concessions, with a guaranty that the views of such spokesmen will be given every consideration and that no treaty will be consummated until a full and complete record of such hearings has been made available to the public.

And, furthermore, that the United States Senate must approve every proposed trade treaty or agreement in its entirety in order to make it effective.

I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, following my remarks, a list of 22 commodities directly competitive with products produced by farmers of the United States. This is a comparative schedule of these 22 commodities for the years 1938 and 1939 and shows immensely increased imports last year over the previous year.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since the birth of our Nation up to the present hour, Congress never has passed an efficient, scientific, or fair tariff act. From the very nature of things a tariff act resolves itself into a logrolling affair. I am not complaining of that. It is natural. It could not be otherwise unless human nature were changed. The idea that 435 Members of the House and 96 Members of the Senate can sit down and agree to a fair, efficient, scientific tariff act containing 5,000 separate items is simply absurd. It cannot be done. It is an impossibility.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], in a very eloquent address here today, said that if we delegated any of this power to somebody else it was an admission of our inefficiency, or words to that effect. In my judgment, instead of being an admission of inefficiency, or lack of ability, it is a confession that we are, after all, only human beings.

Those who oppose this kind of legislation, it seems to me, are standing before the country in an attitude of saying that 531 men can make a fair, efficient, workable tariff act. Everyone knows that is not possible.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me remind the Senator and the Senate that the present tariff law was begun in the House of Representatives in December 1928 and was passed and signed finally by the President in June 1930, taking 19 months, in the two Houses, to write a tariff law.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a fair statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the literal truth.

Mr. NORRIS. It is the truth, of course. What do we get? We get a law which everyone knows is imperfect. It is logrolling legislation. It is natural for all of us to engage in that. We cannot keep out of it. We cannot avoid it when that kind of a proposition is submitted to 531 men. So that it is a confession that, after all, we are human beings. We make no claim to divinity. We make no claim to being superhuman beings. We make no claim that we can perform impossibilities. Everyone who has studied the question at all knows I have stated a fact. The Presiding Officer knows it; the Senate knows it; the House knows it from long experience; the President of the United States knows it; God knows it; the Supreme Court knows it and will take jurisdiction of it as soon as this question reaches the Court. Some of them have had experience with it. They know that what I say is true.

Why, then, say that 531 men, with interests in South Dakota, in Florida, in Nebraska, in Maine, all mixed up together, after logrolling and helping each other out and making the necessary agreements, can pass a perfect tariff bill? Any such bill passed is imperfect, of course. We do not expect it to be perfect. It is not only imperfect, but it is illogical, it is put together in the wrong way. It is not possible to make a good statute by logrolling methods. Everyone knows that the logroller is in control when tariff bills are made in the House and in the Senate.

For years we have tried to get some instrumentality to help us out of this difficult situation. We are confronted with the Constitution, giving Congress jurisdiction and authority to make tariffs. We have found that it has been impossible to enact an efficient, workable, tariff bill. We may agree we are going to frame it on certain conditions, considering the difference in the costs of production, but when we come to vote for a tariff on a little commodity produced in our home section, that is what we are thinking about. We are for manganese in one place; we are for potatoes in another place; we are for wheat in another place, we are for everything under the heavens in some place, and we agree to let the manganese fellow have his way, and the wheat man have his way, and the potato man have his way; and we make a tariff.

We started with the idea several years ago of having a tariff commission to help us. Why did we do that if we were competent to handle the matter ourselves? We have tried for several years, through trade agreements, to frame effective, fair, workable tariffs. Why did we do that? Because we were unable, under the very conditions which confront us under the Constitution, to do it ourselves.

We have had great assistance. We have made advancement. We will make more advancement as fast as we can devise new methods of getting somebody, some lesser number of competent experts, to do this job. We know that we cannot ourselves do it effectively.

Mr. President, I have made this statement about the inability of Congress to make tariffs because, in my judgment, it will have a direct bearing upon the question when it reaches the Supreme Court and they decide whether or not we overstepped our constitutional limitations when we provided for the agreements covered by the law now on the statute books. We must take everything into consideration.

The Supreme Court has discussed this matter a number of times. We have had their decisions pro and con. I do not intend to repeat them. I shall avoid repetition if that is possible, but at this point I wish to insert as a part of my remarks the report of the Committee on Finance on the pending joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the report (No. 1297) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the joint resolution do pass.

TESTIMONY ON OPERATION OF TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The committee has heard the testimony of numerous witnesses relating to the manner in which the Trade Agreements Act has been administered during the past 5½ years and the effect of the agreements on various domestic interests. It has also had before it the extensive record on this subject of the hearings held by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. The voluminous testimony leaves the committee with the clear conviction that the authority delegated to the Executive by this act has been carefully and painstakingly administered with due regard not only to the national interest as a whole but also to the particular interests immediately affected. Striking testimony to this effect was offered by W. L. Monro, president of the American Tariff League, who, although critical of the program, said in his 1938 annual report:

"I will also stress the fact that, in carrying out the trade-agreement policy by Mr. Hull, great credit should be given to the fact that there has been no suspicion of political influence regarding the reduction of duties on any of the articles placed on the reciprocal-trade list. I believe that everyone who has had occasion to contact the staff that makes up the schedules must admit that, regardless of whether we approve of the policy or not, the agreements were prepared solely with a viewpoint of endeavoring to increase foreign trade with the least injury to domestic production."

On March 5, 1940, appearing before this committee, Mr. Monro reaffirmed this opinion.

It is unnecessary to summarize in detail the voluminous testimony presented before the committee and before the Ways and Means Committee of the House. The report of the Ways and Means Committee analyzes the most important aspects of the testimony before that committee on the merits of this legislation.

Let us recall briefly the background against which the trade-agreements program was enacted by the Congress 6 years ago and the improvement which has taken place since that time.

Between 1929 and 1932 our national income had dropped from eighty and eight-tenths to thirty-nine and five-tenths billion dollars. Between 1934 and 1939 it had increased from fifty and six-tenths to seventy billion dollars.

Cash farm income, which had amounted to $11,200,000,000 in 1929, had dropped to the low level of four and seven-tenths billions in 1932; in 1934 had increased to six and three-tenths billions; and by 1939 had recovered to seven and seven-tenths billions, excluding benefit payments.

The wages and salaries in manufacturing industries, which had been $15,800,000,000 in 1929, dropped to seven and four-tenths billions in 1932; had risen to nine and three-tenths billions in 1934; and had increased further to $12,600,000,000 in 1939.

Nonagricultural employment, which had engaged 36,200,000 persons in 1929, had fallen to 27,800,000 in 1932; 30,300,000 persons were employed in nonagricultural pursuits in 1934; and employment recovered to a level of 33,700,000 persons in 1939.

Between 1929 and 1932 our exports declined from five and two-tenths to one and six-tenths billion dollars. This loss of more than three and one-half billion dollars of export business accentuated the difficulties which marked those years. The adoption of the Trade Agreements Act was one part of the program adopted to cope with the problems of that emergency. By 1939 our exports, which in 1934 amounted to two and one-tenth billions, had recovered to a level of $3,200,000,000.

To show the role the trade agreements have played in this improvement in our export trade, there is included herein a table taken from Commerce Reports of February 17, 1940, showing trade with agreement and nonagreement countries. As shown by this table, exports to trade-agreement countries increased by 62.8 percent, whereas those to nonagreement countries improved by only 31.7 percent.

Between 1929 and 1932 there was also a pronounced decline in our imports. Entries from abroad, which had amounted to $4,300,000,000 in 1929, were only one and four-tenths billions in 1932 and one and six-tenths billions in 1934. In the years since the trade-agreements program has been in effect imports have increased, and in 1939 amounted to $2,300,000,000. This increase made possible in part the additional purchasing power required to finance our expanding export trade. As shown by the table, the increase in imports from agreement countries amounted to 21.6 percent, compared with that for other countries of only 12.5 percent.

The agreement concluded with Turkey became provisionally effective only on May 5, 1939, and the agreement with Venezuela only on Dec. 16, 1939. Statistics for these countries are therefore not included in the above calculations.

[3] The apparent discrepancy shown by these figures in comparison with the other totals is due to the noninclusion of trade with Ecuador and the United Kingdom and its Crown colonies.

GENERAL NOTE.—Percentage changes have been calculated upon fuller figures in thousands of dollars.

Reviewing the testimony as a whole, the most striking feature is that the trade-agreements program has accomplished highly beneficial results in the face of trying and discouraging conditions. The record of nearly 6 years' experience with the program shows that reciprocal-trade agreements have been negotiated with 21 countries, accounting for about 60 percent of our foreign trade. In these agreements concessions have been obtained on thousands of separate tariff items, providing improved outlets for hundreds of American agricultural and industrial products. The agreements have in addition safeguarded a large amount of our export trade from the further inroads of trade barriers and discriminations.

In view of the period of time that this act has been in effect, and the scope of the action taken under its authority, it is highly significant that in the course of the hearings before this committee and before the Ways and Means Committee very few witnesses claimed that actual injury had resulted from the agreements. Most of the witnesses appearing in opposition to the program based their opposition not on any claim of injury suffered in the past, but on the apprehension that injury might be suffered in the future. No convincing evidence was presented in support of the relatively few claims that injury has resulted from the agreements. The care with which this authority has been exercised in the past is the surest guaranty against injury in the future. Moreover, the committee is convinced that the "escape" clauses of the agreements themselves provide ample flexibility for dealing with such contingencies as may occur.

PUBLIC SUPPORT OF THE PROGRAM

This program has stood up under the most critical examination in the course of the extended hearings. More than that, it has had perhaps the most widespread approval throughout the country which any important piece of tariff legislation has ever enjoyed. Evidence of this is found in the overwhelming support by the newspapers of the country. Some of the strongest support for this program has come from Republican and independent papers. The same nonpartisan support is found in the polls of public opinion and the almost unanimous endorsement given the program by economists from all sections of the country and by many important national organizations.

NO FEASIBLE ALTERNATIVE SUGGESTED

A further striking feature of the current discussion of this legislation is the absence of any suggestions as to feasible alternatives on the part of those who oppose it. Many opponents of the trade agreements agree that the Nation cannot dispense with a foreign-trade program of some kind. However, most of the opposition witnesses before this committee and the Ways and Means Committee, when asked what they would propose as a substitute for the reciprocal trade agreement program, had no suggestions to offer other than a return to the policy of excessive tariffs such as we had under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930. The disastrous results of such a policy have been so amply demonstrated that there is no need for further comment on the subject in this report.

The only other type of policy which has been suggested is one which, in the opinion of the committee, would be even more objectionable than a return to tariffs of the Smoot-Hawley variety. That suggestion is one which would involve a thoroughgoing regimentation of our foreign trade and of domestic industry and agriculture as well. The following quotation from the statement of the Secretary of State, when he appeared before the committee, is pertinent in this connection:

"Other opponents of the trade-agreements program are putting forward proposals which, in the guise of an allegedly 'more realistic' approach to the whole problem of foreign trade, would go beyond the extremes of the Hawley-Smoot policy and would commit this country to the use of exchange controls, quotas, and all the other devices which in recent years have disrupted and retarded international trade. To abandon the trade-agreements program and to substitute for it a system of this kind would be to destroy the only policy which in recent years has offered effective resistance to a spread of these destructive practices. It would be equivalent to committing our Nation to a course of far-reaching economic regimentation, since the experience of other nations shows clearly that, in an effort to make extreme trade controls function effectively, regimentation has to be constantly extended to other phases of business activity and of economic life in general. It would be a starkly realistic approach, not to an effective promotion of our foreign trade, but to governmental control over business activity on a scale never before attempted in this country, and to a policy of plunging this country into destructive economic warfare, from which no nation ever emerges the gainer.

"The trade-agreements program has enabled us to expand our foreign trade without subjecting it to the strait jacket of extreme Government control. Under it, our trade has increased far more markedly than that of any other of the commercially important nations.

"The program has been devised and carried out as a means of creating conditions in which free enterprise can function most effectively. Reversion to a policy of extreme protectionism or substitution for the trade-agreements program of a policy under which we would adopt all the instruments of economic warfare that have been so disastrously prevalent in the recent past would not only wipe out our recent trade gains but would impose upon our people a further national loss of staggering proportions. Our Government would be compelled to adopt most costly and difficult measures of relief and adjustment and to regiment the country's economic activity. And the most astonishing thing is that courses of action which must inevitably lead to these results are proposed and advocated by the very people who like to regard themselves as the real proponents of free enterprise and nonintervention of government in economic life.

"This is the crux of the whole issue. The question of the survival or disappearance of free enterprise in our country and in the world is bound up with the continuation or abandonment of the trade-agreements program."

PROPOSALS TO REQUIRE CONGRESSIONAL APPROVAL OF INDIVIDUAL AGREEMENTS

Since an impregnable record buttressed by public support bars a frontal attack on the program, the principal strategy of the opposition is a flank attack by means of crippling amendments. The type of amendment which seems to be most in favor for this purpose is that which would provide for Senate ratification or some kind of congressional approval of the individual agreements.

No legal question involved: This type of amendment has been advocated by some persons on the ground that it would remedy certain alleged constitutional defects in the act as it now stands. We shall not undertake here to review again the legal authorities and precedents which so amply support the constitutionality of the act; these are all to be found in the hearings which were held on this legislation in 1934, 1937, and 1940. The report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House contains references to the principal authorities.

The following letter from the Attorney General, which was presented at the hearings, strongly confirms our original conclusion that there is no constitutional objection to this act:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1940.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Complying with your informal request, I am transmitting herewith a memorandum prepared in this Department concerning the constitutionality of the Foreign Trade Agreements Act.

It sets forth the authorities and principles which sustain a strong personal conviction on my part that there is no constitutional objection to this act, and that agreements executed under it are constitutionally unassailable.

Respectfully,

ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General.

(The text of the memorandum referred to in the letter appears in the record of the hearings before this committee on March 6, 1940.)

In view of the long line of precedents for Executive agreements, numbering at least 1,000, and the Supreme Court decisions recognizing the constitutional status of such agreements, the so-called treaty issue seems to be foreclosed as a subject for debate.

Likewise there can be no doubt that the authorities and precedents, which go back to the earliest days of the Nation, afford a complete answer to the charge that this act involves an unconstitutional delegation of legislative powers. The Trade Agreements Act was predicated upon the vital necessity of adopting a procedure which would permit Congress to fulfill its responsibility to regulate our foreign commerce so as to relieve and protect our overseas trade from excessive and arbitrary interference by foreign governments. Viewed in this light alone the act stands squarely within the bounds of the Constitution as laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation (299 U. S. 304, 1936) where it was stated that—

"It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps, serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved."

Moreover, it may confidently be asserted that the Trade Agreements Act fully meets the constitutional principles governing legislation which does not involve international affairs. In the leading case of Hampton Co. v. U. S. (276 U. S. 394, 1928), Mr. Chief Justice Taft stated these basic principles as follows:

"In determining what it (the Congress) may do in seeking assistance from another branch (the Executive), the extent and character of that assistance must be fixed according to common sense and the inherent necessities of the governmental coordination.

* * * * * * *

"If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power."

The limitations and policies prescribed in the Trade Agreements Act constitute an intelligible principle or standard for the guidance of the Executive which is in no degree less precise than the standards contained in the flexible provisions of the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930, and the prior reciprocity statutory authorizations, all of which have been sustained by the courts. The same favorable comparison may be made with the authority delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and upheld by the Supreme Court, to fix rates deemed to be just and reasonable and rates deemed necessary or desirable in the public interest.

Congressional approval from a policy standpoint: Since there is no genuine legal issue involved, any proposal for Senate ratification or congressional approval of the individual agreements must be dealt with purely as a question of policy. From a policy standpoint, the burden of proof is on those who advocate such amendments. The act having been in effect nearly 6 years, a proposal at this time to require a congressional review of each individual agreement could be justified only by an affirmative showing that there have been defects in the operation of the act as it now stands and that there is need for such an amendment. The exhaustive examination of the record discloses no such need. Moreover, experience under tariff legislation in the past shows conclusively that such an amendment would destroy the program. Let those who may doubt this consider our experience under section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1890 and under sections 3 and 4 of the act of 1897. Under section 4 of the latter act 12 treaties were negotiated and, in spite of the strong recommendations of President McKinley and President Theodore Roosevelt, not a single one was permitted to become effective. In contrast with this record of fruitless attempts at reciprocity treaties requiring Senate or congressional approval, is the record of Executive agreements negotiated under prior authorization of Congress but not subject to Senate ratification. Under the McKinley Act of 1890 some 12 reciprocity agreements were made effective, and under section 3 of the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897 some 14 or 15 similar agreements were brought into force.

In the light of experience it is abundantly clear that the requirement of Senate ratification or congressional approval of each individual trade agreement would nullify the program.

However, the committee does not seek to justify the present procedure solely on the ground that it is the only effective means of accomplishing the objectives of the Trade Agreements Act. The committee desires to emphasize that this procedure is wholly in accord with the principles of representative, democratic government. The reasons why this is true are, in the opinion of the committee, basic and wholly convincing.

In the first place it is well to remember that no trade agreement is made without the approval of Congress since the President can only conclude such agreements pursuant to the procedure and within the scope of the policies and limitations previously prescribed by both branches of the Congress. In this important respect trade agreements are completely and fundamentally unlike treaties which may be negotiated by the President without any prior authorization and without any limitations being previously prescribed by Congress or the Senate. It is necessary and wise that under such circumstances treaties should be subject to subsequent approval by the Senate as required by the Constitution, but conversely this sharp difference between treaties and trade agreements well illustrates why there is no such necessity for subsequent approval in the case of agreements which are only concluded pursuant to prior authorization and within the scope of policies previously laid down by Congress. Thus in the true and fundamental sense these agreements are concluded with the approval of both Houses of Congress.

Moreover, in the case of the trade agreements, congressional control is not limited to the prior authorization and prescription of policies and limitations set out in the act. Congress has reserved in the act itself, and it has now on two occasions exercised its right to review the administration of the act and the agreements which have been concluded. The Trade Agreements Act originally, and as extended in 1937, and as now proposed for further extension, limits the authority to conclude agreements to 3 years. In short, the Congress reserves the right to review periodically the operation of the act. No better proof of the thoroughgoing nature of this review can be found than the actual record of the hearings which have been held before this committee and the Ways and Means Committee of the House, both in 1937 and now again in 1940. The bulky volumes which contain the record of these hearings are in themselves convincing arguments that this has been no perfunctory review.

This periodic check-up is a form of subsequent congressional approval which is both practicable and in accord with the proper function of the Congress. One of the principal purposes of Congress in setting up the trade-agreements procedure was to free Congress from the burden of attempting the impossible task of passing on each minute detail involved in keeping the tariff adjusted to current needs. The Congress had the same purpose in mind in the enactment of the flexible provisions of the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930 and action taken by the President under that authority is not made subject to subsequent congressional approval. Similarly, in the case of the numerous administrative agencies such as the Interstate Commerce Commission which Congress has set up to administer specified policies, their rules, regulations, and actions are not made subject to subsequent congressional approval. To do so would simply render Congress ineffectual to do its real job of establishing policy through legislation.

SIGNIFICANCE OF REAFFIRMING THIS POLICY

The committee is impressed with the profound significance attaching to the enactment of this legislation at this time, as set forth in the following excerpt from the testimony of Secretary Hull:

"We are now in a period when, as a result of the new and widespread wars, the need for means of prompt and effective action on the part of the Government in the promotion and defense of our foreign commerce is even more imperative than it has been hitherto. We are in a period in which our economic policies and action may have a determining influence upon the developments, which, after the cessation of hostilities, will shape the future world.

"If we were now to abandon the program, we would reduce to practically nothing the efficacy of the existing trade agreements as a means of safeguarding our exports from the inroads of wartime restrictions. The need for keeping alive the principles which underlie the trade-agreements program is crucial now, during the war emergency, and will be of even more decisive importance after the war. Even a temporary abandonment of the program now would be construed everywhere as its permanent abandonment. Unless we continue to maintain our position of leadership in the promotion of liberal trade policies, unless we continue to urge upon others the need of adopting such policies as the basis of post-war economic reconstruction, the future will be dark, indeed. The triumph or defeat of liberal trade policies after the war will, in large measure, be determined by the commitments which the nations will assume between now and the peace conference.

"At the termination of hostilities there will be an unprecedented need throughout the world for vastly increased production of useful goods of every kind. Only if this vital need is met, can our country and all countries hope for full employment and higher living standards. But production, employment, and living standards cannot be restored and expanded unless the nations decide from the outset to direct their policies toward as rapid as possible a reestablishment of mutually beneficial international trade. Otherwise, the economic life and the political stability of the world after this war will rest upon even more precarious foundations than those upon which they rested after the last war.

"Had the nations of the world, including our own, followed at that time commercial policies conducive to the fullest practicable development of mutually beneficial international commerce, world trade would undoubtedly have expanded on a healthy basis far beyond the limits actually attained, and a foundation would have been laid for stable economic prosperity for all nations. Instead, the nations sought escape from their difficulties in constantly creating greater barriers to trade, the effects of which were obscured for a time by the unhealthy stimulation of reckless borrowing and lending of the 1920's. But the ravages of the great depression, the years of only partial recovery which followed, and finally the supreme tragedy of the new wars have brought retribution for the mistakes and follies of the first decade after the World War.

"Must all this be repeated again, perhaps in an even more acute form, after the present war? That may well be the case if we now turn our backs upon the policy which, under our leadership, has offered in recent years the only hope of promoting trade among nations in such a way as to rebuild the foundations of economic prosperity within nations and of stable peace among nations. Were we to do this we would inflict upon ourselves and upon the world an incalculable injury.

"After the World War, through the policies which we then pursued we helped to create a situation in which the entire economic structure of the world rested upon shifting sands, with nothing in sight but inescapable disaster. The policy which we have pursued for the past 6 years, if we only have the wisdom to continue it, will enable us to place the whole weight of our country's influence behind a determined effort—in which, I am sure, we shall have the cooperation of other nations—to rebuild international economic relationships in such a way that our Nation and all nations can prosper and be at peace."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, following the report of the Committee on Finance I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the letter from the Attorney General, printed in the report, enclosing the memorandum which he sent to the committee, and which will be found on page 729 of the hearings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Enclosure No. 487894 from Department of Justice]

FEBRUARY 29, 1940.

MEMORANDUM RE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The administrative provisions of the Foreign Trade Agreements Act combine two basic principles, namely, (1) executive bargaining with foreign nations with respect to foreign commerce, and (2) flexible adjustments of tariff rates by the Executive.

Executive bargaining with foreign nations with respect to foreign commerce, conducted pursuant to acts of the Congress, is as old as the Government and has been used extensively and effectively during the entire period of our national existence. In fact, in the early days of the Government it was probably the most effective instrument resorted to in connection with the regulation of foreign commerce. This resulted naturally from the conditions existing and from the measures adopted by the Congress to meet those conditions.

To understand fully the conditions confronting the United States in its early history it must be remembered that so long as the Colonies remained under the dominion of Great Britain they were permitted to have no commerce except such as the British Government considered to be in its interests. No manufacturing whatever was allowed in the Colonies. The attitude of the British Government to American manufacturing was truly expressed in Lord Chatham's declaration that he would not permit the colonists to make even a hobnail or horseshoe for themselves. So effectively was this country prevented from developing manufacturing that John Dickinson, of Pennsylvania, could truthfully say in 1777: "We are tillers of the earth from Nova Scotia to West Florida."

After the Colonies gained their independence the British Government continued its policy of attempting to stifle and prevent the development of the commerce of the United States. Harsh and burdensome discriminating practices against our commerce were adopted. England at that time was the strongest nation commercially in the world, and, probably due to her example and influence, other commercial nations, particularly France and Spain, also began to discriminate against our commerce.

As a result of these discriminations the Congress passed numerous retaliatory acts imposing heavy duties and restrictions upon the commerce of those nations which discriminated against the commerce of the United States. Many of those acts vested in the President the power and discretion to either suspend or make applicable the restrictions imposed by the acts with respect to any country dependent upon whether it discontinued or refused to discontinue its discrimination against the commerce of the United States. The nature of these acts and the power and discretion vested in the President thereunder may be illustrated by the following examples:

The act of June 4, 1794 (ch. 41, 1 Stat. 372), empowered the President, "whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require," to lay an embargo upon all commerce with the United States, and to continue or revoke such embargoes whenever he should think proper.

The act of June 13, 1798 (ch. 53, 1 Stat. 565), suspended all commercial intercourse between the United States and France and its dependencies, with the provision that if the Government of France should "clearly disavow" and should "refrain from the aggressions, depredations, and hostilities" against the vessels and property of citizens of the United States and against their national rights and sovereignty and should "acknowledge the just claims of the United States to be considered in all respects neutral," then the President, "being well ascertained of the premises," was authorized to discontinue the prohibitions and restraints imposed by the act and to make proclamation thereof.

The act of February 9, 1799 (ch. 2, 1 Stat. 613), further suspended the commercial intercourse with France and its dependencies with the provision:

"That at any time after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States, by his order, to remit and discontinue, for the time being, the restraints and prohibitions aforesaid * * *; and also to revoke such order, whenever in his opinion the interest of the United States shall require; and he shall be, and hereby is, authorized to make proclamation thereof accordingly."

The act of February 27, 1800 (ch. 10, 2 Stat. 7), also further suspended commercial intercourse between the United States and France, provided:

"That at any time after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, by his order, to remit and discontinue for the time being, whenever he shall deem it expedient, and for the interest of the United States, all or any of the restrains and prohibitions imposed by this act * * *; and also it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, whenever he shall afterward deem it expedient, to revoke such order, and hereby to reestablish such restraints and prohibitions. And the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to make proclamation thereof accordingly."

The act of April 18, 1806 (ch. 29, 2 Stat. 379), prohibited the importation from Great Britain or Ireland of certain articles of merchandise therein enumerated from and after the 10th day of November 1806. The act of December 19, 1806 (ch. 1, 2 Stat. 411), suspended the operation of the former act until July 1, 1807, and section 3 of the later act provided:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized further to suspend the operation of the aforesaid act, if in his judgment the public interest should require it: Provided, That such suspension shall not extend beyond the second Monday in December next."

The act of March 1, 1809 (ch. 24, 2 Stat. 528), again prohibited all commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies. Section 11 of that act provided:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, to declare the same by proclamation; after which the trade of the United States, suspended by this act, and by the act laying embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, may be renewed with the nation so doing."

The provisions of the foregoing act were terminated by the act of June 28, 1809 (ch. 9, 2 Stat. 550), as of the end of the next session of Congress, but section 4 of the act of May 1, 1810 (ch. 39, 2 Stat. 605), provided that in case either Great Britain or France should before the 3d day of March thereafter so revoke or modify her edicts as to cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President should declare such fact by proclamation, and if the other nations should not within 3 months thereafter so revoke or modify her edicts in like manner then the provisions of the act of June 28, 1809, should be revived and have full force and effect against the nation thus refusing or neglecting to revoke or modify her edicts. To like effect, insofar as it related to Great Britain, was the act of March 2, 1811 (ch. 29, 2 Stat. 651). The validity of this act was sustained by the Supreme Court in The Brig Aurora (7 Cranch. 382).

The act of April 27, 1816 (ch. 107, 3 Stat. 310), provided a schedule of duties upon certain goods imported into the United States. Section 3 of the act provided that an additional 10 percent should be added to the rate of duties specified and imposed in respect to all goods imported in foreign vessels other than such as are entitled by treaty or by any act or acts of Congress to be entered in the ports of the United States on the payment of the same duties as are paid on goods, wares, merchandise imported in ships or vessels of the United States. The act of April 18, 1818 (ch. 70, 3 Stat. 432), closed all ports of the United States to vessels of Great Britain coming or arriving from ports closed to American vessels. The act of March 1, 1823 (ch. 22, 3 Stat. 740), suspended the provisions of the act of April 18, 1818, as to certain British ports therein enumerated, but provided that until proof shall have been given the President satisfactory to him that vessels of the United States admitted into the enumerated British ports were required to pay no higher tonnage or imposts duties than those exacted from British vessels on like goods, British vessels coming from the ports enumerated should pay the additional 10 percent tonnage duties provided by the act of April 27, 1816.

The act of January 7, 1824 (ch. 4, 4 Stat. 2), provided that—

"* * * upon satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States by the government of any foreign nation, that no discriminating duties of tonnage or imposts are imposed or levied within the ports of the said nation, upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon merchandise, the produce or manufacture thereof, imported in the same, the President is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and imposts within the United States, are and shall be, suspended and discontinued, so far as respects the vessels of the said nation, and the merchandise of its produce or manufacture, imported into the United States in the same; the said suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President of the United States, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and merchandise as aforesaid, thereon laden, shall be continued, and no longer."

The provisions of section 4 of the act of January 7, 1824, were reenacted in substantially the same language in section 1 of the act of May 24, 1828 (ch. 3, 4 Stat. 308), and were later preserved in section 4228 of the Revised Statutes.

Of similar import was the act of May 29, 1830 (ch. 207, 4 Stat. 419), as relating to commerce with the British ports in the West Indies, on the continent of South America, the Bahama Islands, and other islands named.

The act of May 31, 1830 (ch. 219, 4 Stat. 425), repealed all acts imposing tonnage duties upon vessels of foreign nations, provided the President should be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, had been abolished. The provisions of this act were preserved in section 4219 of the Revised Statutes.

Other acts of similar character to those above enumerated are the act of May 25, 1832 (ch. 104, 4 Stat. 517), the act of July 13, 1832 (ch. 207, 4 Stat. 578), the act of June 30, 1834 (ch. 170, 4 Stat. 741), the act of March 2, 1837 (ch. 19, 4 Stat. 152), the act of June 1, 1842 (ch. 32, 5 Stat. 489), and the act of March 3, 1845 (ch. 66, 5 Stat. 748).

Unquestionably the Congress, in passing the above-mentioned acts, intended that the President should endeavor, through negotiations and agreements with foreign governments, to effect a discontinuance of the discriminations against the commerce of the United States. The Congress faced a difficult situation. The discriminating practices against our commerce being engaged in by foreign nations, ruinous to the country, were becoming more and more burdensome. Something had to be done. To induce foreign nations to discontinue these discriminatory practices, however, required meticulous negotiations, and the Congress as a legislative body could not carry on such negotiations. It did the only thing it could do. It entrusted the conduct of these negotiations to the President. But the President, as Congress realized, could not carry on such negotiations to a successful conclusion without some basis for bargaining—some power or authority to offer to the foreign nations a quid pro quo for their agreement to discontinue the discriminations.

The Congress met the situation by passing the acts referred to, placing heavy burdens and restrictions on the commerce of foreign nations with power in the Executive to suspend or continue them. It thereby gave to the Executive the means with which to trade and barter. The Executive had something to offer a foreign nation in exchange for its agreement to discontinue its discriminatory practices.

Negotiations naturally and necessarily followed the passage of these acts, and as these negotiations led from time to time to the conclusion of an agreement under which a foreign nation discontinued its discriminating practices this fact was announced by proclamation of the President.

The value and effectiveness of this method of dealing with foreign nations in connection with commercial relations was forcibly expressed by President Jackson in his annual message to the Congress December 6, 1830. In this connection he said:

"An arrangement has been effected with Great Britain in relation to the trade between the United States and her West India and North American colonies which has settled a question that has for years afforded matter for contention and almost uninterruped discussion, and has been the subject of no less than six negotiations, in a manner which promises results highly favorable to the parties.

* * * * * * *

"This arrangement secures to the United States every advantage asked by them, and which the state of the negotiation allowed us to insist upon. The trade will be placed upon a footing decidedly more favorable to this country than any on which it ever stood, and our commerce and navigation will enjoy in the colonial ports of Great Britain every privilege allowed to other nations."

The message in question contains a somewhat extensive discussion of the questions involved in the negotiation with Great Britain. That arrangement, which was regarded by both Jackson and his Secretary of State, Martin Van Buren, as a real achievement of diplomacy, did not rest on any treaty. It was effected by unilateral legislative and executive acts on each part, namely, the British statute of July 5, 1825, the order in council of July 17, 1826, the United States act of May 29, 1830, the Presidential proclamation of October 5, 1830, and the British order in council of November 5, 1830. The printed diplomatic correspondence and other papers regarding this arrangement are quite voluminous.

Mr. Van Buren's comments on these acts were:

"The effect of these various enactments has been to vest in the President of the United States the power of granting to any foreign nation willing to reciprocate the same benefit to us, the privilege of importing into, or exporting from, our ports, in its own vessels, the produce of its own soil or manufacture, or of the soil or manufacture of any other country, upon equal terms with those imported or exported in vessels of the United States."

Following the long-established practice of dealing with matters pertaining to commercial intercourse with foreign nations through executive agreements, this Government on November 23, 1863, concluded an "informal convention" with France relating to the exportation of tobacco. A similar agreement was concluded with Austria-Hungary December 24, 1863. (Malloy, vol. 1, p. 38.)

Under section 4228 of the Revised Statutes an agreement was entered into with Spain February 13, 1884, providing for reciprocal abolition of certain discriminating duties on goods imported into the United States from Cuba and Puerto Rico and on American goods imported into those islands. The agreement was brought into force by a proclamation of President Arthur dated February 14, 1884 (22 Stat. 835). This proclamation was revoked by proclamation of President Cleveland dated October 13, 1886 (24 Stat. 1028), upon the finding by the President that the agreement was being persistently violated by the Spanish Government. Further agreements with Spain under section 4228 of the Revised Statutes were entered into on October 27, 1886, September 21, 1887, December 21, 1887, and May 26, 1888.

The Tariff Act of 1890 (ch. 1244, 26 Stat. 567), entitled "An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes" provided for the imposition of penalty duties upon imports from countries discriminating in their tariff treatment against goods from the United States. Section 3 of the act provided:

"That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January 1892, whenever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which in view of the free introduction of such sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the production of such country, for such time as he shall deem just, and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the product of or exported from such designated country as follows, namely."

(Here follows a schedule of duties upon certain enumerated articles to be imposed under the conditions named in lieu of the duties on such articles prescribed in the tariff schedules of the act.)

Under this act a comprehensive program of tariff bargaining by and through Executive trade agreement was inaugurated, and trade agreements with foreign nations were concluded as follows: Brazil, June 4, 1891 (proclaimed Feb. 5, 1892, 26 Stat. 1563); Dominican Republic, June 4, 1891 (proclaimed, Aug. 1, 1891, 27 Stat. 966); Spain, June 16, 1891 (proclaimed, July 31, 1891, 27 Stat. 932); Salvador, December 30, 1891 (proclaimed, Dec. 31, 1891, 27 Stat. 996); Germany, January 30, 1891 (proclaimed, Feb. 1, 1891, 27 Stat. 1004); Great Britain, February 1, 1892 (proclaimed, Feb. 1, 1892, 27 Stat. 999); Nicaragua, March 11, 1892 (proclaimed, Mar. 12, 1892, 27 Stat. 1009); France, April 12, 1892 (informal); Honduras, April 29, 1892 (proclaimed, Apr. 30, 1892, 27 Stat. 1023); Austria-Hungary, May 25, 1892 (proclaimed, May 26, 1892, 27 Stat. 1026); Guatemala, December 30, 1891 (proclaimed, May 18, 1892, 27 Stat. 1025); a second agreement with Salvador (proclaimed, Dec. 27, 1892, 27 Stat. 1056).

Under these agreements the contracting governments agreed to admit certain imports free or at substantially reduced tariff rates fixed therein.

During the time these agreements were being entered into penalty duties were imposed under the act on imports from Colombia, Haiti, and Venezuela, after those countries had failed to respond to requests of this country to negotiate agreements. (See proclamations, Nos. 18, 19, 20, 27 Stat. 1010, 1012, and 1013.)

Section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1897 (ch. 11, 30 Stat. 151, 203), provided:

"That for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries, and their colonies, producing and exporting to this country the following articles: Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude; brandies, or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials; champagne and all other sparkling wines, still wines, and vermouth; paintings and statuary; or any of them, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter, to enter into negotiations with the governments of those countries exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, with a view to the arrangement of commercial agreements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States; and whenever the government of any country, or colony, producing and exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, shall enter into a commercial agreement with the United States, or make concessions in favor of the products, or manufactures thereof, which, in the judgment of the President, shall be reciprocal and equivalent, he shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend, during the time of such agreement or concession, by proclamation to that effect, the imposition and collection of the duties mentioned in this act, on such article or articles so exported to the United States from such country or colony, and thereupon and thereafter the duties levied, collected, and paid upon such article or articles shall be as follows, namely:

" 'Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude, 5 percent ad valorem.

" 'Brandies, or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials, $1.75 per proof-gallon.' "

Under this act the President concluded executive trade agreements with France, Portugal, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, Bulgaria, the Netherlands, Austria-Hungary, and Great Britain. These agreements were all brought into force by proclamation of the President.

The Tariff Act of 1909 (ch. 6, 36 Stat. 11) provided two schedules of duties, a minimum and a maximum, and authorized the President, when he should be satisfied "in view of the character of the concessions granted by the minimum tariff of the United States, that the government of any foreign country imposes no terms or restrictions, either in the way of tariff rates or provisions, trade or other regulations, charges, exactions, or in any other manner, directly or indirectly, upon the importation into or the sale in such foreign country of any agricultural, manufactured, or other product of the United States, which unduly discriminate against the United States or the product thereof, and that such foreign country pays no export bounty or imposes no export duty or prohibition upon the exportation of any article to the United States which unduly discriminates against the United States or the products thereof, and that such foreign country accords to the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States treatment which is reciprocal and equivalent," to so declare by proclamation, and thereafter articles imported into the United States from such foreign country should be admitted under the term of the minimum tariff prescribed. The act further provided that when the President was satisfied that the condition which led to the issuance of the proclamation no longer existed he should by proclamation declare that 90 days thereafter the provisions of the maximum tariff should be applied to importations from the foreign country involved. One hundred and thirty-four proclamations were issued under this act and these proclamations practically included the entire commercial world, making applicable the minimum tariff prescribed.

Section IV of the Tariff Act of 1913 (ch. 16, 38 Stat. 114, 192) authorized and empowered the President to negotiate reciprocity agreements with foreign countries, such agreements to be submitted to the Congress for ratification or rejection. The Revenue Act of 1916 (ch. 463, 39 Stat. 756) authorized the President to prohibit the importation of foreign articles when the same or other domestic articles were refused entry into foreign countries. The act also authorized the President to change, modify, revoke, or renew such proclamation in his discretion.

The Tariff Act of 1922 (42 Stat. 858) contained a flexible-tariff provision in all respects similar in principle to the flexible-tariff provisions of the Foreign Trade Agreements Act. Section 315 (a) of the 1922 act provides, in part:

"That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in costs of production of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the said differences in costs of production in the United States and the principal competing country he shall, by such investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim the changes in classifications or increases or decreases in any rate of duty provided in this act shown by said ascertained differences in such costs of production necessary to equalize the same. Thirty days after the date of such proclamation or proclamations such changes in classification shall take effect, and such increased or decreased duties shall be levied, collected, and paid on such articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila): Provided, That the total increase or decrease of such rates of duty shall not exceed 50 percent of the rates specified in title I of this act or in any amendatory act."

The act also provided that in extreme cases the President could exclude articles of commerce from coming into the United States. Under this act President Coolidge issued 30 proclamations, of which 26 increased and 4 decreased duties on certain classes of articles imported into the United States, and President Hoover issued 32 proclamations of which 16 increased duties and 16 decreased duties.

The provisions of section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922 were substantially reenacted as section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (ch. 497, 46 Stat. 590, 591) (of which act the Foreign Trade Agreements Act is an amendment), and Executive adjustment of tariff rates thereunder have continued.

The two principles combined in the Foreign Trade Agreements Act have been long and effectively used in connection with the regulation of foreign commerce. Also both have been fully sanctioned by the Supreme Court.

In Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649) the constitutionality of the Tariff Act of 1890 was before the Court. Section 3 of that act granted to the President the power to engage in tariff bargaining and in connection therewith to enter into Executive trade agreements with foreign nations—a power similar in all respects to the first power granted to the President in the Foreign Trade Agreements Act. The constitutionality of the act was attacked upon two grounds—(1) that it contained an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the President, and (2) that it delegated to the President the power to make treaties in violation of the treaty-making power of the Constitution. After an extensive review of the history of congressional delegations of power to the President in connection with the regulation of commerce, the Court said (pp. 690–693):

"It would seem to be unnecessary to make further reference to acts of Congress to show that the authority conferred upon the President by the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not an entirely new feature in the legislation of Congress, but has the sanction of many precedents in legislation. While some of these precedents are stronger than others, in their application to the case before us they all show that, in the judgment of the legislative branch of the Government, it is often desirable, if not essential for the protection of the interests of our people, against the unfriendly or discriminating regulations established by foreign governments, in the interests of their people, to invest the President with large discretion in matters arising out of the execution of statutes relating to trade and commerce with other nations. If the decision in the case of the brig Aurora had never been rendered, the practical construction of the Constitution, as given by so many acts of Congress, and embracing almost the entire period of our national existence, should not be overruled, unless upon a conviction that such legislation was clearly incompatible with the supreme law of the land. (Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch 299, 309; Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304, 351; Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How. 299, 315; Lithographic Co. v. Sarony, 111 U. S. 53, 57; The Laura, 114 U. S. 411, 416.)

"The authority given to the President by the act of June 4, 1794, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States 'whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require,' and under regulations to be continued or revoked 'whenever he shall think proper'; by the act of February 9, 1799, to remit and discontinue, for the time being, the restraints and prohibitions which Congress had prescribed with respect to commercial intercourse with the French Republic, 'if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States,' and 'to revoke such order whenever, in his opinion, the interest of the United States shall require'; by the act of December 19, 1806, to suspend, for a named time, the operation of the nonimportation act of the same year 'if, in his judgment, the public interest should require it'; by the act of May 1, 1810, to revive a former act, as to Great Britain or France, if either country had not by a named day so revoked or modified its edicts as not 'to violate the neutral commerce of the United States'; by the act of March 3, 1815, and May 31, 1830, to declare the repeal, as to any foreign nation, of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, when he should be 'satisfied' that the discriminating duties of such foreign nations, 'so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States,' had been abolished; by the act of March 6, 1866, to declare the provisions of the act forbidding the importation into this country of neat cattle and the hides of neat cattle to be inoperative 'whenever, in his judgment,' their importation 'may be made without danger of the introduction or spread of contagious or infectious disease among the cattle of the United States'; must be regarded as unwarranted by the Constitution if the contention of the appellants in respect to the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, be sustained.

"That Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular under consideration, is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not, in any real sense, invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States, which the President deemed—that is, which he found to be—reciprocally unequal and unreasonable. Congress itself prescribed in advance the duties to be levied, collected, and paid on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides produced by or exported from such designated country while the suspension lasted. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President.

"The words 'he may deem' in the third section, of course, implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, and form a judgment as to whether they were reciprocally equal and reasonable, or the contrary, in their effect upon American products. But when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions reciprocally unequal and unreasonable were imposed upon the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring the suspension as to that country which Congress had determined should occur. He had no discretion in the premises except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation in obedience to the legislative will he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the lawmaking department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries, should be suspended in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

"The court is of opinion that the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not liable to the objection that it transfers legislative and treaty-making power to the President."

In the Union Bridge Co. v. United States (204 U. S. 364), the Court quoted extensively and with approval from Field v. Clark. Other cases in which the courts have sustained trade agreements concluded by the President under powers granted him by the Tariff Acts of 1890 and 1897 are Downs v. United States (187 U. S. 496); Nicholas v. United States (122 Fed. 892); United States v. Tartar Chemical Co. (127 Fed. 944); United States v. Julius Wile Bros. & Co. (130 Fed. 331); United States v. Luyties (130 Fed. 333); Migliavacca Wine Co. v. United States (148 Fed. 142); La Manna, Azema & Garnan v. United States (144 Fed. 683); and Mihalovitch, Fletcher & Co. v. United States, 160 Fed. 988.

The constitutionality of the principle of flexible adjustments of tariff rates by the Executive was before the Supreme Court in Hampton & Co. v. United States (276 U. S. 394). That case involved the constitutionality of section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922, which was substantially the same as the flexible tariff provisions of the Foreign Trade Agreements Act. In holding the 1922 statute constitutional, the Court said (pp. 404–410):

"First: It seems clear what Congress intended by 315. Its plan was to secure by law the imposition of customs duties on articles of imported merchandise which should equal the difference between the cost of producing in a foreign country the articles in question and laying them down for sale in the United States, and the cost of producing and selling like or similar articles in the United States, so that the duties not only secure revenue but at the same time enable domestic producers to compete on terms of equality with foreign producers in the markets of the United States. It may be that it is difficult to fix with exactness this difference, but the difference which is sought in the statute is perfectly clear and perfectly intelligible. Because of the difficulty in practically determining what that difference is, Congress seems to have doubted that the information in its possession was such as to enable it to make the adjustment accurately, and also to have apprehended that with changing conditions the difference might vary in such a way that some readjustments would be necessary to give effect to the principle on which the statute proceeds. To avoid such difficulties, Congress adopted in 315 the method of describing with clearness what its policy and plan was and then authorizing a member of the executive branch to carry out this policy and plan, and to find the changing difference from time to time, and to make the adjustments necessary to conform the duties to the standard underlying that policy and plan. As it was a matter of great importance, it concluded to give by statute to the President, the Chief of the executive branch, the function of determining the difference as it might vary. He was provided with a body of investigators who were to assist him in obtaining needed data and ascertaining the facts justifying readjustments.

"There was no specific provision by which action by the President might be invoked under this act, but it was presumed that the President would through this body of advisers keep himself advised of the necessity for investigation or change, and then would proceed to pursue his duties under the act and reach such conclusion as he might find justified by the investigation, and proclaim the same if necessary.

"The Tariff Commission does not itself fix duties, but before the President reaches a conclusion on the subject of investigation, the Tariff Commission must make an investigation and in doing so must give notice to all parties interested and an opportunity to adduce evidence and to be heard.

"The well-known maxim 'Delegatus non potest delgari,' applicable to the law of agency in the general and common law, is well understood and has had wider application in the construction of our Federal and State Constitutions than it has in private law. The Federal Constitution and State constitutions of this country divide the governmental power into three branches. The first is the legislative, the second is the executive, and the third is the judicial, and the rule is that in the actual administration of the government, Congress or the legislature should exercise the legislative power; the President or the State executive, the Governor, the executive power; and the courts or the judiciary the judicial power; and in carrying out that constitutional division into three branches, it is a breach of the national fundamental law if Congress gives up its legislative power and transfers it to the President, or to the judicial branch, or if by law it attempts to invest itself or its members with either executive power or judicial power. This is not to say that the three branches are not coordinate parts of one government and that each in the field of its duties may not invoke the action of the two other branches, insofar as the action invoked shall not be an assumption of the constitutional field of action of another branch. In determining what it may do in seeking assistance from another branch, the extent and character of that assistance must be fixed according to common sense and the inherent necessities of the governmental coordination.

"The field of Congress involves all and many varieties of legislative action, and Congress has found it frequently necessary to use officers of the executive branch, within defined limits, to secure the exact effect intended by its acts of legislation, by vesting discretion in such officers to make public regulations interpreting a statute and directing the details of its execution, even to the extent of providing for penalizing a breach of such regulations (United States v. Grimaud, 220 U. S. 506, 518; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470; In re Kollock, 165 U. S. 526; Oceanic Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U. S. 320).

"Congress may feel itself unable conveniently to determine exactly when its exercise of the legislative power should become effective, because dependent on future conditions, and it may leave the determination of such time to the decision of an Executive, or, as often happens in matters of State legislation, it may be left to a popular vote of the residents of a district to be affected by the legislation. While in a sense one may say that such residents are exercising legislative power, it is not an exact statement, because the power has already been exercised legislatively by the body vested with that power under the constitution, the condition of its legislation going into effect being made dependent by the legislature on the expression of the voters of a certain district. As Judge Ranney, of the Ohio Supreme Court, in Cincinnati, Wilmington and Zanesville Railroad Co. v. Commissioner (1 Ohio Sta. 77, 88), said in such a case:

" 'The true distinction, therefore, is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made.' See also Moers v. Reading (21 Penn. St. 188, 202); Locke's Appeal (72 Penn. St. 491, 498).

"Again, one of the great functions conferred on Congress by the Federal Constitution is the regulation of interstate commerce and rates to be exacted by interstate carriers for the passenger and merchandise traffic. The rates to be fixed are myriad. If Congress were to be required to fix every rate, it would be impossible to exercise the power at all. Therefore, common sense requires that in the fixing of such rates, Congress may provide a commission, as it does, called the Interstate Commerce Commission, to fix those rates, after hearing evidence and argument concerning them from interested parties, all in accord with a general rule that Congress first lays down that rates shall be just and reasonable considering the service given and not discriminatory. As said by this Court in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Goodrich Transit Co. (224 U. S. 194, 214), 'The Congress may not delegate its purely legislative power to a commission, but, having laid down the general rules of action under which a commission shall proceed, it may require of that commission the application of such rules to particular situations and the investigation of facts, with a view to making orders in a particular matter within the rules laid down by the Congress.'

"The principle upon which such a power is upheld in State legislation as to fixing railway rates is admirably stated by Judge Mitchell, in the case of State v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. (38 Minn. 281, 298, to 302). The learned judge says on page 301:

" 'If such a power is to be exercised at all, it can only be satisfactorily done by a board or commission, constantly in session, whose time is exclusively given to the subject, and who, after investigation of the facts, can fix rates with reference to the peculiar circumstances of each road, and each particular kind of business, and who can change or modify these rates to suit the ever-varying conditions of traffic. * * * Our legislature has gone a step further than most others, and vested our commission with full power to determine what rates are equal and reasonable in each patricular case. Whether this was wise or not is not for us to say; but in doing so we cannot see that they have transcended their constitutional authority. They have not delegated to the commission any authority or discretion as to what the law shall be—which would not be allowable—but have merely conferred upon it an authority and discretion, to be exercised in the execution of the law, and under and in pursuance of it, which is entirely permissible. The legislature itself has passed upon the expediency of the law, and what it shall be. The commission is entrusted with no authority or discretion upon these questions.' See also the language of Justices Miller and Bradley in the same case in this Court (134 U. S. 418, 459, 461, 464).

"It is conceded by counsel that Congress may use executive officers in the application and enforcement of a policy declared in law by Congress, and authorize such officers in the application of the congressional declaration to enforce it by regulation equivalent to law. But it is said that this never has been permitted to be done where Congress has exercised the power to levy taxes and fix customs duties. The authorities make no such distinction. The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate making power in interstate commerce, by declaring the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates, and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with its provisions the fixing of such rates, justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise. If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power. If it is thought wise to vary the customs duties according to changing conditions of production at home and abroad, it may authorize the Chief Executive to carry out this purpose, with the advisory assistance of a tariff commission appointed under congressional authority. This conclusion is amply sustained by a case in which there was no advisory commission furnished the President—a case to which this Court gave the fullest consideration nearly 40 years ago.

Speaking on this same subject in Norwegian Nitrogen Co. v. United States (228 U. S. 294, 308), the Supreme Court said:

"The powers of the President under the flexible tariff provisions of the act of 1922 differ in degree rather than in kind from powers that have long been his."

In 1934 conditions affecting this country's foreign commerce were comparable to those affecting it in the early days of the Government. Again that commerce was burdened and harassed on every hand by unfair and discriminatory practices of foreign countries. The need for immediate and effective measures to remedy these evils was urgent. Faced with this situation the Congress resorted to those measures which had proven effective under comparable circumstances in the past.

The Congress had the constitutional right to do this. In addition to the long history of the use of these measures the Supreme Court had expressly approved their constitutionality. Besides, that Court has long held that the Congress in the exercise of a power vested in it by the Constitution may exercise a wide discretion in the choice of measures and may employ any appropriate means available. In McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316), Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the Court, said:

"A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great power will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would, probably, never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves. That this idea was entertained by the framers of the American Constitution is not only to be inferred from the nature of the instrument, but from the language (p. 407).

"* * * a government, entrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the Nation so vitally depends, must also be entrusted with ample means for their execution. The power being given, it is the interest of the Nation to facilitate its execution. It can never be their interest, and cannot be presumed to have been their intention, to clog and embarrass its execution, by withholding the most appropriate means. * * * that instrument does not profess to enumerate the means by which the powers it confers may be executed * * * (p. 408).

"The Government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means * * * (p. 409).

"To employ the means necessary to an end is generally understood as employing any means calculated to produce the end * * * (p. 413).

"It must have been the intention of those who gave these powers, to insure, so far as human prudence could insure, their beneficial execution. This could not be done by confining the choice of means to such narrow limits as not to leave it in the power of Congress to adopt any which might be appropriate, and which were conducive to the end. This provision is made in a Constitution, intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means by which Government should, in all future time, execute its powers, would have been to change, entirely, the character of the instrument, and give it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can be best provided for as they occur. To have declared that the best means shall not be used, but those alone, without which the power given would be nugatory, would have been to deprive the legislature of the capacity to avail itself of experience, to exercise its reason, and to accommodate its legislation to circumstances. If we apply this principle of construction to any of the powers of the Government, we shall find it so pernicious in its operation that we shall be compelled to discard it (p. 415)."

The provisions of the Foreign Trade Agreement Act here considered are quite different from the statutory provisions considered by the Supreme Court in Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan et al. (293 U. S. 388). In that case the Court dealt with section 9 (c) of the National Industrial Recovery Act (48 Stat. 195, 200), relating to the transportation of "hot oil," and held this statute to be unconstitutional because the Congress had declared no policy, had established no standard, and had laid down no rule, thus leaving the statute with no "requirement, no definition of circumstances and conditions in which the transportation is to be allowed."

In the Panama Refining Co. case, however, Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for the Court, said (p. 421):

"Undoubtedly legislation must often be adapted to complex conditions involving a host of details with which the National Legislature cannot deal directly. The Constitution has never been regarded as denying to the Congress the necessary resources of flexibility and practicality, which will enable it to perform its functions in laying down policies and establishing standards, while leaving to selected instrumentalities the making of subordinate rules within prescribed limits and the determination of facts to which the policy as declared by the legislature is to apply. Without capacity to give authorizations of that sort we should have the anomaly of a legislative power, which in many circumstances, calling for its exertion would be but a futility."

Other decisions of the Supreme Court supporting the rule thus stated by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes will be found in St. Louis & Iron Mountain Ry. Co. v. Taylor (210 U. S. 281); Arizona Grocery Co. v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. (284 U. S. 370), both of the above decisions sustaining delegation of rate-making power to the Interstate Commerce Commission; Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S. 470), sustaining delegation to the Secretary of the Treasury of power in connection with the importation of tea; Union Bridge Co. v. U. S. (204 U. S. 364), sustaining delegation to the Secretary of War of power in connection with the removal of obstructions to navigation; United States v. Grimaud (220 U. S. 506), sustaining delegation to the Secretary of Agriculture of power to make rules and regulations governing national forest reserves; Red "C" Oil Manufacturing Co. v. North Carolina (222 U. S. 380), sustaining validity of a North Carolina statute delegating to the board of agriculture of that State powers governing the sale of illuminating oils; and in many others too numerous for citation.

The Foreign Trade Agreements Act fully measures up to the standards thus prescribed. The Congress was confronted with a condition requiring legislation adaptable "to complex conditions involving a host of details" with which the Congress itself could not deal directly. The Congress met this condition by laying down a definite policy, establishing definite standards, prescribing definite procedure to be followed, and leaving to the Executive the carrying out of the declared policy within prescribed limits upon a determination of the applicable facts.

It is important, moreover, to bear in mind that the Panama Refining Company case dealt with an act of Congress relating to internal affairs as distinguished from foreign affairs. This distinction was noted by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes when, after referring to the early embargo acts discussed above in this memorandum, he stated that these acts were "cognate to the conduct by him (the President) of the foreign relations of the Government," thus indicating that the Court recognized that broader latitude obtains in the international field than exists with reference to domestic affairs. This differentiation was prophetic of the decision of the Supreme Court in the more recent case of United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation et al. (299 U. S. 304).

The Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation case dealt with the joint resolution of May 28, 1934, and the proclamation of the President issued thereunder prohibiting the sale of arms or ammunitions of war to countries engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco. The validity of the statute and of the proclamation were attacked on the grounds of unconstitutional delegation of legislaive power. Sustaining the act and the proclamation, the Supreme Court said, in part:

"It is important to bear in mind that we are here dealing not alone with an authority vested in the President by an exertion of legislative power, but with such an authority plus the very delicate, plenary, and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the Federal Government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress, but which, of course, like every other governmental power, must be exercised in subordination to the applicable provisions of the Constitution. It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved (pp. 319–320)."

The Court carefully explained that—

"When the President is to be authorized by legislation to act in respect of a matter intended to affect a situation in foreign territory, the legislator properly bears in mind the important consideration that the form of the President's action—or, indeed, whether he shall act at all—may well depend, among other things, upon the nature of the confidential information which he has or may thereafter receive, or upon the effect which his action may have upon our foreign relations. This consideration * * * discloses the unwisdom of requiring Congress in this field of governmental power to lay down narrowly definite standards by which the President is to be governed.

* * * * * * *

"In the light of the foregoing observations, it is evident that this Court should not be in haste to apply a general rule which will have the effect of condemning legislation like that under review as constituting an unlawful delegation of legislative power. The principles which justify such legislation find overwhelming support in the unbroken legislative practice which has prevailed almost from the inception of the National Government to the present day" (pp. 321–322).

The Court concluded:

"* * * It is enough to summarize by saying that, both upon principle and in accordance with precedent, we conclude there is sufficient warrant for the broad discretion vested in the President to determine whether the enforcement of the statute will have a beneficial effect upon the reestablishment of peace in the affected countries * * * and to prescribe limitations and exceptions to which the enforcement of the resolution shall be subject" (p. 329).

It is not important from the point of view of the constitutionality of a law delegating authority to an agency with respect to tariff matters whether the Congress specifies a particular rate to be applied in a given situation or a maximum or minimum rate beyond the limits of which changes may not be made. Both classes of legislation have been enacted and have been held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court. But far beyond either of these situations are the well known rate-making cases in which the Congress has prescribed no rate and no range within which rates may be fixed, but rather has left to the rate-making body, namely, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the determination of "just and reasonable rates." (St. Louis & Iron Mountain Ry. v. Taylor, supra; Arizona Grocery Co. v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. et al., supra.)

In view of the historic exercise by the President, under authority of acts of the Congress, of powers similar to those granted in the Foreign Trade Agreements Act and of the express declarations of the Supreme Court in the cases mentioned, it would seem that there no longer exists any sound basis for a contention that the Foreign Trade Agreements Act is unconstitutional because it contains an unwarranted delegation of legislative power. As has been aptly stated:

"Legally and structurally, the Trade Agreements Act seems a model of statutory effectiveness. It is clear, easily construed, and constitutionally orthodox; * * * (46 Yale Law Journal (1937), 669–670)."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Attorney General says that after examining the authorities, which were correlated under his direction, he has no doubt whatever of the constitutionality of the act. I wish to read briefly a quotation from the Supreme Court of the United States in an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Taft. It was in the case of Hampton Company v. United States (276 U. S. 394). The Chief Justice said:

In determining what it (Congress) may do in seeking assistance from another branch—

The executive—

the extent and character of that assistance must be fixed according to common sense—

That is not only good law, but it is itself common sense—and the inherent necessities of the governmental coordination.

Common sense and the coordination of the Government itself must be considered. What are the propositions confronting us? Has the Congress tried to delegate to some board or the Executive an authority which, from the nature of things, it cannot perform itself? Chief Justice Taft says it must present itself to us as a matter of common sense, and when that is done, we have a right to provide the instrumentality with which to carry into effect the law we have made.

The Chief Justice further said:

If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power.

Mr. President, my contention is that is what this act does. Let us see what it provides. We are to consider all the circumstances, and take a common-sense view of the whole situation, as Chief Justice Taft said. I shall read now from the act. The joint resolution proposes to put into effect for 3 years more a certain act of Congress.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I am interested in the remarks of the Senator in relation to common sense. I am wondering whether it is not common sense to adopt the Pittman amendment, which would virtually make the Senate a board of review as to the merits of any suggested agreement or treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in my judgment, the adoption of the Pittman amendment would kill the whole measure as dead as a doornail. It would largely put us back to where we were when we started. The Senate would be kept in the picture and we would have a revision of the tariff. Every time an agreement was made and referred to the Senate it would have to be ratified by a majority of two-thirds, which in all ordinary circumstances would be an impossibility. So if we include the Pittman amendment in the measure, goodbye. The only excuse for voting for the joint resolution, if the Pittman amendment should be adopted, would be because of a fervent hope that the amendment would be stricken from the measure in conference.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that it would be no more logical, even if a little more candid, to move to strike out all after the enacting clause in the measure than to insert the Pittman amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I would say so, except for the hope that the amendment would be stricken out in conference.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, if the House were to disagree to the amendment, we would still have another vote on the question of receding from the amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. In view of the Senator's statement that, in his opinion, the adoption of the Pittman amendment would kill the trade-treaty program as dead as a doornail, would the Senator care to elaborate upon where we would be going, where we would be drifting, and what would happen if we had no program to follow in the event the Pittman amendment should be adopted?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's question is a perfectly proper one, but I was in the midst of explaining what we were doing.

Mr. LUCAS. I will withdraw the question now.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall take it up later; but if I should forget to do so, if the Senator will remind me I shall be glad to discuss the question later.

Mr. LUCAS. Very well. I withdraw the question.

Mr. NORRIS. What are we going to do? We are going to extend the law, and that law provides:

For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living. * * *

Are those laudable aims? Do we want to do those things? That is the purpose for which we are proposing to extend the law. That is what we are laying down as a guide for the President when he extends the law.

in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce) by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States, the President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time—

(1) * * *—

And then are enumerated the things he has a right to do.

Mr. President, is that laying down a sensible program? As Chief Justice Taft asked: "Is that common sense?" Let us read again what the Chief Justice said:

If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of power.

That is the program we are laying down. That is the program we want to carry out. We admit that we as a Congress are not able to do it, even though the Constitution of the United States gives us the authority to do it.

Mr. President, that is not all. That is not the only precaution we have taken. The act further provides:

(2) The President shall be authorized—

If the President, after investigation, makes the findings which I have enumerated, for the purposes I have set forth, which are in the law, then he has the power to—

(1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and

(2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder.

That is another restriction on the President. It sets forth what he can do to carry out the objects we have enumerated and placed in the law.

No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists. The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly, or indirectly: Provided, That the President may suspend the application to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country because of its discriminatory treatment of American commerce or because of other acts or policies which in his opinion tend to defeat the purposes set forth in this section; and the proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall be in effect from and after such time as is specified in the proclamation.

There are quite a number of other restrictions, but, Mr. President, because the time is limited I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the entire act which, if the pending legislation shall be adopted, we are continuing in effect for 3 years more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The act is as follows:

[Public—No. 316—73d Cong.—H. R. 8687]

An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930

Be it enacted, etc., That the Tariff Act of 1930 is amended by adding at the end of title III the following:

"PART III. PROMOTION OF FOREIGN TRADE

"SEC. 350. (a) For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce), by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States, the President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time—

"(1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and

"(2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists. The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly or indirectly: Provided, That the President may suspend the application to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country because of its discriminatory treatment of American commerce or because of other acts or policies which, in his opinion, tend to defeat the purposes set forth in this section; and the proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall be in effect from and after such time as is specified in the proclamation. The President may at any time terminate any such proclamation in whole or in part.

"(b) Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the application, with respect to rates of duty established under this section pursuant to agreements with countries other than Cuba, of the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on December 11, 1902, or to preclude giving effect to an exclusive agreement with Cuba concluded under this section, modifying the existing preferential customs treatment of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of Cuba: Provided, That the duties payable on such an article shall in no case be increased or decreased by more than 50 percent of the duties now payable thereon.

"(c) As used in this section, the term 'duties and other import restrictions' includes (1) rate and form of import duties and classification of articles, and (2) limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties, imposed on importation or imposed for the regulation of imports."

SEC. 2. (a) Subparagraph (d) of paragraph 369, the last sentence of paragraph 1402, and the provisos to paragraphs 371, 401, 1650, 1687, and 1803 (1) of the Tariff Act of 1930 are repealed. The provisions of sections 336 and 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall not apply to any article with respect to the importation of which into the United States a foreign trade agreement has been concluded pursuant to this act, or to any provision of any such agreement. The third paragraph of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall apply to any agreement concluded pursuant to this act to the extent only that such agreement assures to the United States a rate of duty on wheat flour produced in the United States which is preferential in respect to the lowest rate of duty imposed by the country with which such agreement has been concluded on like flour produced in any other country; and upon the withdrawal of wheat flour from bonded manufacturing warehouses for exportation to the country with which such agreement has been concluded, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the imported wheat used, a duty equal to the amount of such assured preference.

(b) Every foreign trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination, upon due notice to the foreign government concerned, at the end of not more than 3 years from the date on which the agreement comes into force, and, if not then terminated, shall be subject to termination thereafter upon not more than 6 months' notice.

(c) The authority of the President to enter into foreign trade agreements under section 1 of this act shall terminate on the expiration of 3 years from the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act shall be construed to give any authority to cancel or reduce in any manner any of the indebtedness of any foreign country to the United States.

SEC. 4. Before any foreign trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe; and before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

Approved, June 12, 1934, 9:15 p. m.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we are met at the moment by Senators, able constitutional lawyers, whose honesty and patriotism and ability I do not question, who state this legislation is unconstitutional. Since I have been in the Senate and in the House I have very seldom known of any hotly contested measure being under consideration concerning which someone did not exclaim "It is unconstitutional." I have heard that statement made with respect to important legislation ever since I have been in the Senate. I remember many years ago when Congress had under consideration the Webb-Kenyon bill. The House passed it. The Senate passed it and it went to the President, President Taft, and he vetoed it. His veto was based on one ground only, that it was unconstitutional, and he made an argument which was a masterpiece. Along with it he sent to Congress an argument made by his Attorney General, a longer and more extended argument. They were both masterpieces. Both declared the legislation to be unconstitutional. I saw Senators rise in their places, and before them were piled ponderous law books in such numbers that the Senators were hidden behind them. They proclaimed the measure unconstitutional. They said "Unclean. Unclean. We cannot pass the measure. We must not pass it."

Mr. President, I had voted for the bill, and then listened to the debates with respect to its constitutionality. I was frightened because of the wonderful array of legal talent which said the measure was unconstitutional. I had no doubt they were in earnest, and I was obliged to doubt my own judgment. As I looked at the matter, as I listened to the arguments, I was still unconvinced. I voted for the bill, and I voted to pass it over President Taft's veto. It became law. It went to the Supreme Court very shortly afterward, and the Supreme Court said it was constitutional. And the Supreme Court will hold that the legislation we are now considering is constitutional. If anything ever seemed plain to my mind it is that this law is perfectly constitutional when we take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding it and, as Chief Justice Taft said we should do, take a common-sense view of the situation.

I have now reached a point where I think I can yield to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]. What was his question?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I rise to ask the Senator a question. I agree with the argument which has been made by the distinguished Senator, that in the event we shall adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], to all intents and purposes trade agreements will be dead. I should like to have the Senator comment, in his able way, if he cares to do so, upon what he thinks the future of the country would be with respect to a commercial program with foreign nations in the event we should not continue the program which we now have under consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator. I had intended to discuss that question, but probably I should have forgotten it if the Senator had not called it to my attention. It is an important question.

A war is going on in Europe. Suppose we kill this legislation, which we can do either by voting down the joint resolution or by adopting the Pittman amendment. Where shall we be at the close of the great struggle in Europe? Shall we be prepared to protect ourselves and to act in harmony and with discretion among the surviving nations in Europe, whichever they may be? Shall we be able to put together the fragments and pieces of a torn and shattered civilization, or help to do so, without any disadvantage to our people, or with as little disadvantage as possible? That problem may be before us shortly. I cannot say. I do not have the vision of prophecy. But, Mr. President, in my judgment the time will come—it may be in 6 months or it may not be for 2 or 3 years—when we shall be faced with a destroyed civilization, a world rent asunder, with the civilization of Europe torn to shreds, and a suffering world in the agonies of desperation and death.

If we do nothing here, can we offer those nations some adjustment of the tariff situation? I do not know what adjustment will be necessary; but we know it will apply to practically every nation which survives, if any survive.

Shall we be prepared? If so, how? If we defeat this legislation, Senators, the only preparation we shall have is for the Senate and the House of Representatives to go over the world making treaties. According to the Pittman amendment, that can be done if two-thirds of the Senate agree to it.

Mr. President, in my judgment the time will come, in the not distant future, when the situation suggested by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] will face us, our Nation, and our people. Shall we be able to meet the situation when we face it? Shall we be prepared to meet it with instrumentalities of government? If the President has the authority under the act to make the agreements set forth under the stipulations I have placed in the RECORD, it seems to me that is as far as human ingenuity can go in devising ways to meet the situation which will confront us at that critical period.

Therefore, it will be more important within the next 3 years than it has been during the past 3 years that the ability to do some good for ourselves and for the world shall exist in the law, and that we shall not be helpless.

Mr. President, in that connection I wish to read again what Chief Justice Hughes said in the case of United States against Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation. The opinion of the Supreme Court in that case takes up the foreign situation. It calls to the attention of our country the fact that the foreign situation may be entirely different from the domestic situation, and that we are authorized to go further in the foreign situation than in the domestic situation. Let me read from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of U. S. v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation (299 U. S. 304):

> It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restrictions which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved.

Think of that, Senators! That is the language of the Supreme Court on this question. We are unprepared for what may come after the World War unless we extend this law.

Mr. President, it seems plain that the Supreme Court has said that in foreign relations it will go further in upholding a delegation of power—if we wish to call it that—than in purely domestic affairs.

In the Panama Refining Co. case Chief Justice Hughes laid down a rule. In that case the Court found that the delegation was too great, but it laid down a rule which ought to apply to every case. It applies to this case. This is what the Court said:

> Undoubtedly legislation must often be adapted to complex conditions involving a host of details with which the national legislature cannot deal directly. The Constitution has never been regarded as denying to the Congress the necessary resources of flexibility and practicality, which will enable it to perform its functions in laying down policies and establishing standards, while leaving to selected instrumentalities the making of subordinate rules within prescribed limits and the determination of facts to which the policy as declared by the legislature is to apply. Without capacity to give authorizations of that sort we should have the anomaly of a legislative power, which in many circumstances, calling for its exertion would be but a futility.

Mr. President, those opinions from the Supreme Court of the United States lead me to conclude that we have presented before us not entirely a domestic situation, but one which deals almost entirely with foreign trade. The Court has clearly said, in so many words, that we can go further in that case than we could if we were dealing only with domestic matters. That is apparent to any student who will think. The reasoning of the Court cannot be attacked. It cannot be denied. Every Senator must know that to be true. We are delegating power to the President to do something in relation to foreign matters which we as Senators and Members of the House cannot ourselves do. The power applies directly to the ability to carry on and make agreements at the close of the present war in Europe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All time on the amendment has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. Without objection the clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to insert the following:

> SEC. 2. Effective on the date of enactment of this act, section 2 of such act of June 12, 1934, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:
>
> "(d) No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under section 1 of this act shall take effect until the Senate of the United States shall have advised and consented to its ratification, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring."

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY. I desire to obtain the floor, in the hope that I may have it immediately after the vote shall have been taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Several Senators have asked for recognition immediately after the vote in order to offer amendments. Just what arrangement has been made, the Chair does not know.

The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement the vote will now be taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, on this question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. HILL's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HILL] is absent on public business. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. LUNDEEN (when his name was called). On this amendment I have a pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea." If present and voting, the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr.

HILL]. If that Senator were present, as stated by his colleague, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LUCAS (when Mr. SLATTERY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SLATTERY] is unavoidably detained on important public business. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BARKLEY (when Mr. TYDINGS' name was called). The senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is unavoidably absent in fulfillment of an engagement which he made weeks ago. Yesterday he announced that he had a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who is necessarily absent. If the Senator from Maryland were present today, he would vote "nay," and if the Senator from Montana were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILEY (when his name was called). On this amendment I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], who is detained on public business. If the Senator from Nebraska were present, he would vote "yea," and the Senator from North Carolina, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS] is detained on public business.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] has been unexpectedly called to West Virginia on important public business. I am advised that he has a pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN]. The Senator from West Virginia, if present and voting, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 44, as follows:

So, Mr. PITTMAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi. Before the Senator proceeds, the Chair will request that there be order on the floor and in the galleries.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of California rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Mississippi. (Putting the question.) The "ayes" appear to have it——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I was on my feet asking for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not see the Senator. The Senator from California asks for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). On this question, as previously announced, I have a pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. If that Senator were present he would vote "yea" on this question, and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILEY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY]. If he were present he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from Nebraska would vote "nay," and the Senator from North Carolina would vote "yea."

Mr. MINTON. The Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN]. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea," and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 40, as follows:

So Mr. HARRISON's motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 8, after "1940", it is proposed to insert a comma and the following:

with the proviso that the authority conferred in the said act does not embrace authority to include in any trade-agreement negotiations excise taxes imposed under the provisions of paragraphs (4), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (c) of section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, which are now a part of the Internal Revenue Code, subtitle (c), chapter 29, subchapter (b), part 1, sections 3420, 3422, 3423, 3424, 3425.

Mr. McCARRAN obtained the floor.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut, if in the interim we may have an understanding that the Senator from Connecticut may conclude his speech and that my amendment, which is now pending, may go over until Monday.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is entirely satisfactory. I was satisfied that the Senator did not want to take up the amendment this afternoon.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut on that agreement.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, because of the tremendous importance of the proposal and subject now under consideration, I feel in duty bound to make a statement setting forth the principal reasons why I supported the Pittman amendment, and why, without the Pittman amendment, I am opposed to and shall vote against the joint resolution, as I voted against similar measures on two previous occasions.

I shall not discuss the matter in great detail. The resolution and its powers, and the possible consequences of its continuance, are so well known to the Members of the Senate, and the matter has been so forcefully and eloquently and intelligently dealt with since we took up the debate on Monday at noon, that there is little need for me to delay the Senate for any length of time in an explanation of my views.

But I also feel that in view of the magnitude of the question, and the fact that it is so definite a departure from the age-old doctrine of the Democratic Party, I would not be true to myself, or to the constituency which I have the honor in part to represent, or to the Senate, were I to let the matter pass without some comment.

As is so often the case when Members of Congress legislate under the stress of serious economic situations, or when congressional action is hastened by pressure from any source, the Congress is in danger of failing to weigh and measure all of the consequences of this action.

When the law, the extension of which we are now considering, was passed in 1934, we were sitting in the afterglow of the bewildering panic years which had in many instances heightened the fears and lessened the courage of the American people, and made some of us temporarily forget our glorious past, and the fact that we had remained a great and powerful Nation by adhering to the teachings of an enlightened group of men, who very patiently, and with a rare degree of calm, framed the fundamental law at Philadelphia nearly a century and a half before.

I was opposed to this law in 1934, and voted against it.

The fact that it seemed to work successfully again prompted Congress and our national leadership to speed its reenactment and the extension of its provisions in 1937. I was opposed to granting a renewal of the authority at that time; and now, as we near the end of the second extension, my views remain unchanged. I am still opposed to it.

I see in the earlier action of the Congress, and in what we now seem about to do, a danger to the Republic, and a threat—perhaps not yet too clear—to the form of government of which we are so proud, and through which we have attained the highest place in a world that has experimented with so many different forms of government.

The Constitutional Fathers, fresh from the Revolution and just out from under the yoke, came together quite unhampered by a pressure from outside. The members of that early convention—who, I believe, were especially inspired by Divine direction—patiently worked out a document which up to this time has weathered the storms and has directed the Nation forward to one success after another, and to a wealth and a power not dreamed of in the lives and generation of the men who wrote the Constitution. Sometimes we have faltered; sometimes we have been compelled to stop for a new footing, or a breathing spell; and once or twice we were compelled to retreat, but only for a strategic purpose. Never once until 1929, however, was there serious reason to believe that there was the slightest danger of defeat.

On the wisdom of their deliberation and decision we have, until lately, taken our stand. They have had our everlasting applause and our enduring appreciation, and while we have sometimes been in disagreement as to their full intent and purpose, their language is for the most part as clear as any language ever penned by statesmen. These men seem to have had an especial gift of vision that penetrated the lengthening years ahead. They provided a peculiarly protective flexibility in the Constitution, and we have taken advantage of that flexibility to meet changing economic conditions which these men seemed to know were inevitable. We can stretch the language, but we cannot set it aside excepting in the manner which they provided.

While political parties and statesmen have sometimes disagreed over constitutional meaning, they have, upon the completion of their deliberations, and in their resulting decisions, finally found satisfaction, and safely made progress. Sometimes we have made mistakes. Sometimes the Executive has made mistakes. On occasions the Supreme Court, in short periods of darkness, got off the path, but almost always—yes; I think I can safely say almost always—when the mistakes were discovered there was a correction of the error.

I should like to believe that if the step we are about to take is a great wrong—and I am sure it is—once again there will be a correction. But on that point I am afraid, because we are in the shadows of a world upheaval. We are living in compartments of days, and when we are completely honest with ourselves our frailties loom pretty large, and we are making slow progress in a world of economic and political uncertainty. The nations of the world are pretty much in the throes of confusion and despair, and because we do not know what is coming next, and because it is still very dark, it is extremely dangerous to move fast, lest we take a false step that may cause us, and perhaps those about us, serious harm.

I now tell my colleagues that I see in this proposal the possibility of dictatorship; but I hasten to add that it is not a dictatorship of our present national leadership, or any President immediately following, of which I am afraid. I am afraid of a dictatorship of a majority group. I am afraid of a dictatorship of centralized government that is given its power by the Congress of the United States. Any kind of dictatorship, excepting the clear dictatorial voice of the American people, will prove disastrous to our form of government. So long as we have hearkened to our American sovereign power we have been successful. That power was created by the Constitution, and the rights of the Chief Executive, and the Congress, and the Supreme Court, seem to me to have been in most instances clearly defined—and where the founding fathers felt a reluctance or uncertainty about the future, they reserved the powers for the States of the new Union and the people.

During the past few days we have heard a most interesting debate. It has been kept upon a high plane, and the speeches and observations have been made by men of deep thought and high purpose, and with an appreciation of the seriousness of what we do. I can, and want to, associate myself almost entirely—though not quite entirely—with the remarks of both the able Senators from Nevada and the distinguished senior Senator from Wyoming. I am without their gifts of eloquence, and fall short of their knowledge of the law, but none of us can lightly dismiss the force of their arguments. Up to now there has been no challenging satisfactory answer—at least for me—to the facts they set forth, and, because the language of the Constitution is so clear that those who run may not only read but understand, I cannot visualize a successful answering argument to what they have said.

It seems to me that this proposal offends, and trespasses upon, and violates, the fundamental law; and, while there is a remote possibility that the failure of its reenactment might slightly retard the business of some, and seem to dissipate the noble aims of others, let us ever be mindful that we can change the law, even the fundamental law, when the people want it changed. I would not be completely fair with myself if I did not confess that there have been times in my life when I should have liked to see a greater power in the Federal Government, but the surrender to central power has so weakened, and in instances actually destroyed, the voice of the peoples in other once happy lands, that I do not want to surrender another particle of congressional authority.

Neither would I be fair to myself or to the proponents of the measure before us, if I did not just as freely confess that I favor reciprocal-trade treaties. I am confident that they can be made to work, and work favorably and to great advantage, for I have a greater confidence than some other men in the Senate of the United States, and I do not believe that there are men here who would long forget their country's welfare because a great legislative proposal, benefiting the entire country, threatened to slightly hinder an industry or business in an individual State.

I have on hundreds of occasions, and with a real joy and satisfaction, publicly applauded President Roosevelt and his accomplishments and leadership. I have been and I am on his side. The place he will be accorded in history is so great that I think it is beyond our imagination. I think he saved his country and its nearly perfect form of government, and I have a complete and abiding faith in his patriotism and nobility of purpose and in his political wisdom. In my judgment, there is no man better informed on international affairs, or so well acquainted with internal affairs. I see no man with a greater love of his neighbor; but I do feel, in this instance, as I have in one or two others, that his intensity of purpose has been so great and fervent that he temporarily fell into the shadow of his own burning desire to bring his countrymen out of the depths. This ambition has carried him farther than any man of our time, or perhaps of all time, and has lifted his country up with him, and history and the readers of history down through the ages will ever remember with prideful respect and grateful recollection the goodness of his deeds, the successes of his administration, and the greatness of his character.

I also have profound respect for Secretary of State Hull, as well as an unbounded admiration for his noble and lofty aspirations. But never let it be said that each Chief Executive of this Nation, or any Secretary of State is entitled to exercise and practice his philosophy of tariff and treaty making, and his own ideas on the method of stimulating foreign trade, without adherence to the directional signs of the Constitution.

I beg the Senate to believe or perhaps I should more respectfully say give thought to one fact, which is that another President of the United States, in another cloudy period of our national life may be an extremely high protectionist or a free trader. I believe it was partially with that thought in mind and the determination that the representatives of the people would have the last word on the method of regulating foreign commerce and on the right of approval or disapproval of treaty agreements with other nations that the founders wrote the treaty language. I believe it was with these things uppermost in their minds, in those days of careful discussion and penetrating thought, that the Founding Fathers, the 55 men at Philadelphia, prepared a document which should never die.

While the proponents of this measure are motivated only by a desire to protect business and our economic life, let us not forget that a false step might ruin business. Let us always keep in mind that a free-trade executive or a high-protectionist could ruin any business—or favor any business—even if influenced by a conscientious desire to do only good. He might, under this extraordinary power, take another step, or more than one, which would do us irreparable damage, and finally destroy the form of government we cherish. Perhaps I am wrong in my view that it is on the side of wisdom to keep to the language of the Constitution, and, if I am, a way is provided for such changes as the people may care to make.

I would be against a change in this instance. I would help to carry an argument to the people; but if the view I entertain was overridden by a majority, it would not then be a violation of the law to centralize this power. The advocates of the plan do have the avenue to reach the fulfillment of their desire, and, while the proceedings might be painfully slow for them, it is ever so much better that there be a delay and a mistake than that there be haste, and a tragedy.

Mr. President, I know the views of the strongest advocates of the measure. I know that the State Department, and the administration leadership, and some of those who are greatly concerned with the promotion of business between nations, feel that if we had adopted the Pittman amendment we might fall back upon the painful logrolling practices of an earlier day. For myself, let me say that I have a very high opinion of the combined view of Senators. Especially do I have such an opinion if they can be kept free from the spell cast by the burning views of men so motivated by their desire for world trade that they would boldly set aside the traditions of 150 years and the simple but careful directions of the men who so shortly before offered their lives for the creation and preservation of this free country.

Occasionally Congress has fallen under such a spell. I have said that the Congress has made mistakes—perhaps more often than the Executive—but up to now it has erased most of the errors which were made under the strong lash of public opinion, and in the excitement often created by a struggle to get through the economic or social shambles.

I believe it was the very distinguished late Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, when dealing with the same sort of questions we have before us now, who said that the skies are never entirely clear. That statement may ever be true.

Some men find it less difficult than others to abandon the safeguards of the fundamental law; but we should try to remember that other peoples, who have yielded to what they thought was an expeditious, and the easier, way, have sacrificed the almost sacred privilege of a direct voice in the management of their own lives, and business, and governmental affairs. We are reaching for security and tranquillity, and that is just what the peoples of certain saddened nations of other parts of the world were seeking when they abandoned the rights and powers they held as individuals. What they obtained for the sacrifice far from balanced the scales, and was worthless from the viewpoint of free Americans, to whom the dignity of man is paramount. These peoples may some day recapture their loss, but I doubt that it will come back to them very soon, or at least without the shedding of blood and a preceding greater chaos.

I have referred to the dignity of man. Let me for a moment refer to the dignity of nations. Since the passage of the original Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, the United States has entered into a total of 22 reciprocal-trade pacts. In three instances the foreign governments with whom we entered into such treaties required no legislative action to complete the pacts. These countries were Belgium, Cuba, and Ecuador. But let me point out that in one of these cases, namely, that of Ecuador, it was later found, "for reasons of unexpected necessity" that the matter had to be submitted to the national assembly.

In the cases of Canada and Czechoslovakia and France, and also the Netherlands, Switzerland, Turkey, Great Britain, and Venezuela, it is, or was—Czechoslovakia is temporarily nonexistent—necessary to submit the treaties to their legislative bodies. I must confess that I am not, beyond that, familiar with the mechanics of the foreign procedure in the cases of these treaties, but I do know that the treaties are only provisionally effective until passed upon by the parliamentary bodies.

Now let me give a list of the countries in which the agreements are not at all effective until they receive legislative approval. These are: Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Finland, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Sweden.

It seems strange to me—very strange—that the greatest and most powerful country in the world has suggested that its legislative body is not dependable in the matter of determining what is best for its people. This part of my statement might be stretched out to a long discussion, but I do not want to detain the Senate too long, and I leave this reference to the thought and consideration of my colleagues.

During the course of this debate Senators have pointed out how reciprocal-trade treaties heretofore enacted have actually set aside parts of earlier treaties which had undergone Senate ratification. One of the references in this connection was submitted by the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] during the masterly address of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], when he pointed out that a trade treaty made with Colombia in 1936, contained the following language:

As long as the present agreement remains in effect it shall supersede any provisions of the treaty of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce between the United States and the Republic of New Granada.

Immediately after that important contribution to the debate, the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] obtained the right to interrupt, and pointed out that in the trade treaty with Belgium there was contained "identical language affecting a treaty of 1872, known as the Belge-Luxemburg Treaty."

Witness after witness has at sometime or at some place testified on this subject, and the discussions we have had in the Senate during the past few days have furnished reason and reference which prove very definitely, at least to me, the need that we stop where we are and revise the method of making reciprocal-trade treaties.

I feel compelled to agree with the request of the senior Senator from Nevada, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that nothing be done at the moment to interrupt existing agreements. I would not help to throw world trade out of gear by making retroactive the action proposed by the Pittman amendment. I would start afresh and anew, just as I would have started in 1934, and I would not make a new treaty excepting in the traditional and refreshing American way.

Mr. President, I should now like to make an observation or two which are not especially related to my argument, but which do have a bearing on the subject. Let us keep in mind that we can never compel others to buy from us, and that in many instances other people have refrained from buying when we expected, with good reason, that they would. The complications of the moment are so great, and governmental responsibilities throughout the world so confusing and uncertain, that other nations are living in compartments of days, as we are, and they seek to protect themselves as best they can.

Elsewhere government finances and currencies are uncertain, and we know not what tomorrow will bring. The wars on either side of us will force men and nations to move in surprising directions. We have internal complications bearing upon agriculture and business that further greatly confuse our trade ambitions and necessarily affect our trade plans. I doubt that we would now make a new treaty under any circumstances, and I doubt that we have a right to expect that any nation will favor us with business just because we want or need business. Great Britain, probably hanging on by her fingertips, is resorting to unusual practices in her foreign trade. She demands payment in dollars. We do not yet know exactly how much this means to us, but we are somewhat afraid of the possible consequences.

Witnesses almost without end could be called in defense of the stand I take, and if we had easy access to the storehouse of records on this subject we would find statements made by members of all parties that would help to steady our thinking. Some others who have spoken in this debate have called the Secretary of State as a defense witness, and I am going to call witnesses briefly to testify for my opinion. Before I do so, however, I want to refer the Senate to the statement of the man who was the first choice of the President of the United States for his Attorney General. Next I call upon the best witness I know. Let me read. I read from a statement which was issued in 1929, when Herbert Hoover was President of the United States, and when the tariff question was the issue of the moment. This particular statement, while made concerning an issue not identical with today's issue, was directed to the so-called flexible tariff, which my party then maintained was an illegal delegation of congressional power. The statement, in part, is as follows:

A question of far-reaching consequence transcending considerations of party prompts us to issue a public statement in relation to the so-called flexible provisions of the tariff bill now pending before the Senate.

The question involved is one that, in our opinion, strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of the Government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

Whatever argument could be advanced during the war and immediately following for delegation to a degree of the taxing power to the Executive unquestionably no longer exists. To incorporate now in the law any recognition of a right of the Executive to impose taxes without the concurrence of the legislative branch is without justification.

Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable.

Mr. President, I should like to say, in parenthesis, that it does not seem to be so terribly objectionable now.

It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government, for which the independence of the country was attained, and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

There is no issue here as to the integrity of any Executive who has had, or may have, extended to him the exercise of this power. The issue is one of taxation by one official, be he President or monarch, in contrast to taxation by the representatives of the people elected, entrusted exclusively with the power to seize the property of the citizen through taxation. If proof were needed that the danger which the forefathers foresaw is inherent in this issue, a mere casual inquiry into the methods employed, selfish influences used, sinister schemes and contrivances brought to bear, one need but examine the record.

Bear in mind, Senators, that this is not my language. I am not saying this. I am reading from a statement made by distinguished Americans. I wish to emphasize the fact that they said that the question involved is "one that in our opinion strikes at the very roots of constitutional government"; and I wish to reiterate that, at a time when they were deliberating calmly, they said: "There was no party question involved." I read further from the statement:

The principle is: Are taxation laws, and their application, to be made virtually in secret, whatever may be said about a limiting rule, or are they to be enacted by the responsible representatives of the people in the Congress, where public debate is held and a public record made of each official's conduct?

The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character is tyranny. Resistance to the impairment of this popular right has largely occasioned many of the wars and revolutions of the past.

An issue of this importance should not be associated with the opinions or necessities of those interests, States, or sections that directly profit by some rate schedule in the body of the tariff act. With respect to the principle here at stake, any trading or logrolling is especially unjustifiable and indefensible. Neither should we be unduly influenced by the attempt to divert attention from this momentous issue by condemnation of, and emphasis upon, the dilatory and unsatisfactory results of congressional procedure.

Mr. President, it is odd that at this late date we are now compelled to listen to the statement that our foreign trade will stop unless the act is continued, and that it would be a violation of the Constitution to adopt such a proposal as the Pittman amendment. I blush with shame.

I read further:

No one seeks to prevent or in any way to interfere with the investigations and reports of the Tariff Commission in connection with emergency tariff legislation. The point is, we emphatically insist that final action and responsibility based on Tariff Commission reports shall be taken by the Congress.

I leave the statement for a moment to reemphasize that that is my feeling today; to say again that I believe in commercial treaties; to say again that I abhor logrolling; and to point out once more that I have faith in the Congress and great faith in the Senate and in the patriotism of its membership.

I continue to read from the statement:

For the purpose of preventing apprehended congressional delay an amendment has been made providing for the submission of the reports to the Congress by the President, and, furthermore, an amendment will be presented strictly limiting action by the Congress to matters germane to the particular subject matter or rates recommended by the President after investigation by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. President, I pause for a moment to say that such an amendment will be presented again, and Senators will once more have an opportunity to justify their statement.

I continue to read:

We do not hesitate to say that if this extraordinary and what we believe to be unconstitutional authority passes now from the Congress, it is questionable if there will ever again be a tariff bill originated and enacted by the Congress.

I digress again for a moment to point out that the distinguished signers of this statement felt then, as I do now, that the danger was great. Let me say that it is even greater at this moment.

Again I read:

It is our solemn judgment—

This is a Democratic statement, Mr. President. I am quoting from the language of the chairman of the Finance Committee, the majority leader of the Democratic Party, and other Members of this body who have just voted against the Pittman amendment.

Again I read:

It is our solemn judgment that hereafter all taxation through the tariff, and regulation of commerce thereby, will be made by the Executive.

At this point I wish to say, in parenthesis, that their prediction, based upon their solemn judgment is in danger of becoming true; and some of them will help to bring it about. I read again:

It is the inherent tendency of this tariff-changing device and the apparently conscious purpose of its proponents to use it to keep the tariff out of Congress where it is such an embarrassing business, as everyone knows, to the party that profits politically by it. So also it will be of distinct advantage to the interests that are the direct beneficiaries of the tariff.

In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his Government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.

Mr. President, they were my teachers. This Democratic leadership helped to keep in me the faith I learned in the dark days of the Democratic Party. This statement, which is now more important than when it was made in 1929, will be of long-lasting interest. The signers and the authors concluded this fine democratic argument in the following sentence:

In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad, public view of this important public question, we make this appeal.

Mr. President, I likewise make my humble appeal, although I have no desire to arouse the people. I want to arouse and quicken the immediate thinking of my colleagues in the Senate. I want to reawaken the thinking and patriotic sentiment which prompted the writing and the issuance of the statement which I have just read. It was signed by the then outstanding leaders of the Democratic Party in the United States. They were Members of the United States Senate. They were members of the Finance Committee. Save one, they are all here now, and are still the leaders. I hope that those of them who may have reached a new opinion have not permitted the new view to become too firmly fixed.

Mr. President, no body of men in all the world has a greater burden of responsibility than the Senators here assembled this afternoon. What we do is of such far-reaching consequence that I discuss this matter with a deep feeling of humility, and I hope an appreciation of my own limitations. My pride in our keeping the traditions of democracy is not so great as it once was, as I find myself compelled humbly to seek an opportunity to talk with the tariff-making committee—made up of men almost unknown to those whom I represent—to beg them not to treat too harshly the people of my State. If a plan for tariff making by a small committee of men—men out of reach of the people—coupled with the suggestion that such a group make trade treaties unhampered by the peoples' opinion, had been proposed at the Constitutional Convention I doubt that the statesmen present would have given it more than a moment's passing notice.

What we do here at any time affects almost every home in the land, and what we do here on this occasion may be felt forever after in America. It may bear upon the future success and happiness, and perhaps even the liberty, of free-born American men. It is a concentration of power more dangerous than a concentration of wealth; and I hope it is not too late for the voices of those of us opposed to the measure in its present form to be heard above the desire of other patriotic men, who seem to see a short cut to improved conditions.

I have already said that the Constitution is flexible and enables us to go far in many directions; but I beg the Senate to heed the fact that in the instance where it is touched by this subject, it is touched "head on," and the language which this measure violates is as clear as language can be.

There is much that I fail to understand in the economic confusion of our world today; and I frequently fail to keep up with what sometimes prove to be flexible interpretations of lawyers. Sometimes I find it especially hard to keep pace with the changing interpretations of the brilliant lawyers in the Senate.

Patience has ever been a paramount virtue of government, though in times of stress it is difficult to practice patience, because the tendency to expedite is prominently and everlastingly present. Those who are impatient, despite the fact that we profitably kept faith with the authors of the Constitution for generations, need a further word of warning.

Attempting to hurdle or circumvent the Constitution, when such a venture is encouraged by what gives promise of being a happy result, is just as dangerous as such an attempt for an evil purpose. If I may be coldly harsh in the choice of a word, let me issue a warning that it is horribly unwise to open the gate in this manner. There may be a horseman somewhere behind who is not bent on a mission of such noble intention. I once said on the floor of the Senate that it is dangerous to entertain the idea that every administration is entitled to a sympathetic Court. I now say again, as forcefully as I can, that it is no less dangerous to follow the thought that every Executive is entitled to complete freedom in the consummation of treaties. I feel on this matter more deeply than I can explain; and while I conclude with a feeling that my contribution to the debate has not been great, I wish my senatorial associates to have some idea of the reasons for the views I hold and the vote I shall cast.

A great humorist once said that the Constitution follows the flag on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. In fact, that famous Mr. Dooley had even less respect for the certainty of our constitutional government when he penned the famous phrase to the effect that the Constitution followed the election returns. Certainly, Mr. President, we Senators, if for no other reason than our solemn oath to uphold the Constitution, ought to see to it that the Constitution follows no group, no theory, no passing fancy of man or men, but follows the sacred path laid out by the founding fathers.

The Constitution, with reference to treaties, in article II, section 2, provides that—

The President * * * shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

There can be no mistaking that language. It cannot be changed by interpretation or desire. Even the fondest friends of this legislation cannot demonstrate that the measure we debate is not a treaty-making proposal. If there ever was a time when this august body should hold close to the constitutional fathers, these are the days. I refuse to compromise the treaty-making power of the United States Senate. I will not give an inch.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram addressed to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and me from Frank Graham, O. C. Carmichael, and Frank Ahlgren, representing the Southern Council on International Relations. In this telegram we are advised that the council today voted unanimously urging Congress to renew without change the Trade Agreements Act.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 1759) granting the consent of Congress to the States of Montana, North Dakota, and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact or agreement for division of the waters of the Yellowstone River, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. WHITE of Idaho, Mr. HILL, and Mr. HAWKS were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

JAPANESE-AMERICAN RELATIONS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in all discussions of the subject of Japanese-American relations I am always disposed to assume that there is an underlying desire on both sides to maintain friendly relations and mutual good will. I have had frequent occasion to point out that whatever feelings of mistrust existed were attributable to lack of candor—perhaps I may use a stronger word, and say the secrecy that has been encountered.

When the Congress at the last session had under consideration the Navy's plan for harbor improvements at the island of Guam, objection was raised on the ground that to do so would tend to give offense to Japan and impair our friendly relations with that nation. I then had occasion to call attention to the secrecy maintained by Japan in reference to her administration of the mandate islands in the Pacific under her jurisdiction. I pointed also to Japan's unwillingness, since the expiration of the naval limitation treaties, to exchange with us information with reference to naval plans and naval expansion programs.

Recently a Japanese report to the League of Nations on the administration of the mandate islands in the Pacific near Guam has been made public. The information contained in this report, and its relation to the naval problem are discussed in an editorial which was published in the Washington (D. C.) Star, and which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star of March 26, 1940]

JAPAN'S LITTLE JOKE

Japan's belated report on her administration of the mandate islands in the Pacific should prove enlightening—and altogether embarrassing—for those in Congress who were responsible for disapproving the Navy's plans for improvement of the harbor at Guam, our small but strategically important insular possession near the mandate groups. It now appears that while the critics of the Guam project have been expressing fears that harbor improvements at the island might offend Japan, the Japanese have been having a secret little joke at our expense. They have been very busy with some extensive harbor improvements of their own right in the vicinity of our island outpost—with utter unconcern as to whether Uncle Sam would like it or not. While anti-American elements in Japan were viewing with what must have been mock alarm our Navy's plans for dredging coral reefs from Guam's waters, "because Guam is less than 1,500 miles from Japan," Japanese engineers, under cover of strictest secrecy, were dredging a harbor and building a pier at Saipan, about 150 miles north of Guam. Other "harbor improvements" are under way or planned, according to Japan's report for 1938 to the League of Nations, a copy of which has just reached the State Department here.

We will have to take Japan's word for it that the improvements are for commercial purposes. No American is permitted to visit any of the more than 600 islands in the mandate groups. Strangers are not wanted there. The report showed that only 12 foreigners visited the islands in 1938, and none was an American. It will be recalled that only last year, when a fishing boat from Saipan was wrecked at Guam, the Japanese refused to permit an American vessel to return the survivors to Saipan. Instead, the American ship was met at sea by a boat from Saipan.

The report was especially significant by reason of an omission. Although the 1937 report stated specifically that no fortifications were being constructed on the islands, there was no such assurance in the present statement, although it is contended here that Japan is obliged to refrain from fortifying them. Whether Japan might feel offended or not, she should be required to give this assurance without further delay. Her report is incomplete without it. And until a complete report is filed, Japan is in no position to protest about any open-and-above-board harbor improvements or even fortifications that we should wish to undertake at Guam.

Mr. WALSH. In addition to the information set forth in this editorial, the Japanese report indicates that a service of "air transportation, of mails and official documents, etc., between Japan and Saipan and Palau" was initiated in December 1938. I regret that this apparent lack of frankness on the part of Japan, and the fact that no American is permitted to visit any of the more than 600 islands over which Japan has only a mandate control under the League of Nations, are undoubtedly hindering the friendly relations and mutual good will which all peace-loving Americans earnestly desire to exist between the two nations.

Recently, I was asked to give a statement for publication in Japanese newspapers indicating what I believe would contribute to the maintenance of friendly relations between Japan and the United States. I ask to have it printed as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is to be taken for granted that the peoples of the United States and of Japan sincerely desire the maintenance of friendly relations and mutual good will. Neither nation, I am confident, has any ulterior designs upon the other.

In my opinion, nothing will contribute more, at the present juncture, to this desirable objective than exercise by each nation of the utmost frankness and candor in dealing with the other. If each nation can be brought to the realization that the other entertained no hidden purposes or political secrets, not only with respect to its relations with the other and with the world at large, but even with respect to their internal policies for the promotion of the general welfare of their peoples, it would contribute immensely toward maintenance of an unmistakable attitude of good will, and secure, to both countries, peace and prosperity.

Both Japan and the United States will serve the best interests of their peoples and promote the peace of the world by sincerely living up to the admonition of George Washington in his Farewell Address when he said:

"Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony. * * * Nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachment for others, should be excluded; and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated."

GOLDEN GATE INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT SAN FRANCISCO

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution for the continuation of the San Francisco Exposition. It has been 3 weeks since the joint resolution was favorably reported by the Foreign Relations Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) to provide for participation of the United States in the Golden Gate International Exposition at San Francisco in 1940, to continue the powers and duties of the United States Golden Gate International Exposition Commission, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 22, after the word "participating", to strike out "foreign"; in the same line, after the word "nations", to insert "under the administration of the Commission"; and, on page 3, line 1, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$250,000" and insert "$50,000", so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That in order that the United States may continue its participation in the Golden Gate International Exposition at San Francisco, Calif., in 1940, the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the world's fair to be held by the San Francisco Bay Exposition, Inc., in the city of San Francisco during the year 1939, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1937, as amended by this joint resolution, is extended and made applicable to the continuance of the participation of the United States in such exposition in 1940 in the same manner and to the same extent and for the same purposes as originally provided in such joint resolution of July 9, 1937.

SEC. 2. Section 4 (relating to the powers and duties of the United States Golden Gate International Exposition Commission) of such joint resolution of July 9, 1937, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraphs:

"(f) To produce (whether through a governmental agency or otherwise) and sell engravings, etchings, or other reproductions not prohibited by law, to the extent authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, and souvenir books descriptive of the functions of the Federal Government. All proceeds from the sale of these articles shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriations made for carrying into effect the provisions of this joint resolution.

"(g) To erect, rehabilitate, maintain, and operate buildings for use by participating nations under the administration of the Commission and to represent such participants in all dealings with the San Francisco Bay Exposition, Inc. For the purposes of this paragraph there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000."

SEC. 3. Section 6 of such joint resolution of July 9, 1937, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: "Section 3709 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to any purchase or service rendered for the Commission when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $500."

SEC. 4. The second proviso of the first paragraph of section 7 of such joint resolution of July 9, 1937, is amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That the Commission may, if it deems it desirable and is in the public interest, transfer, with or without consideration, the title to the Federal Exhibits Building or Buildings or other Commission-owned property to the city and county of San Francisco or to any Federal, State, or local governmental agency."

SEC. 5. In addition to the sum of $1,500,000 authorized by such joint resolution of July 9, 1937, to be appropriated for the participation of the United States in the Golden Gate International Exposition and appropriated by the Third Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1937, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $250,000 for participation in 1940.

SEC. 6. The act entitled "An act to authorize the United States Golden Gate International Exposition Commission to produce and sell certain articles, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1938, is hereby repealed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 29, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Son of God, our Saviour and Redeemer, be patient with our deficiencies; woo all unbrotherliness from our hearts and forgive us in the plentitude of Thy love and mercy; lead us to repentance that Thy very word may have breath in human hands and deeds. Hasten the day, dear Lord, when men shall learn that right and not might, that character and not efficiency, that Christ and not Caesar shall rule; and by these both men and nations are to live. O fill us with one pursuit which shall never lose its enchantment; one task that shall always yield new and soul-deep satisfactions; to deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

"I AM AN AMERICAN"

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. LELAND M. FORD]?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I am speaking this morning also for my friend and colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHEPPARD], and what I shall say also has the approval of the majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], and the minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], and Speaker BANKHEAD. I am speaking in connection with the "I Am an American" citizenship celebration and I want to draw particular attention to a short radio address by Edward Arnold, vice president of the Screen Actors' Guild, over the N. B. C., on the creed, which was written by Benjamin E. Neal.

This creed should guide and inspire the young voters of this country with a real ideal and understanding of Americanism.

The radio address and creed follow:

RADIO ADDRESS BY EDWARD ARNOLD

In this period of American history, I think it is a fine thing that men and women of good will, regardless of social, political, or religious differences, can find and stand on common American ground.

We may differ as to what we consider the best thing for our country but all true Americans agree on certain fundamentals.

To encourage appreciation of the many liberties and the unequaled benefits of American citizenship, is the purpose back of the "I Am an American" citizenship celebration.

In the brief time allotted me, I can do no finer thing than read to you the creed "I Am an American," which climaxes the annual celebration in honor of 21-year-old young Americans. The creed, written by Ben Neal, founder of the movement, expresses a high American ideal—I am an American.

I AM AN AMERICAN

(By Benjamin E. Neal)

I am an American.
The Golden Rule is my rule.
In humility and with gratitude to Almighty God,
I acknowledge my undying debt
To the founding fathers
Who left me a priceless heritage
Which now is my responsibility.
With steadfast loyalty
I will uphold the Constitution
And the Bill of Rights.
I will treasure my birthright
Of American ideals.
I will place moral integrity
Above worldly possessions.
Problems of interest to my country
Shall be of interest to me.
I will count my right of suffrage
To be a sacred trust,
And I will diligently strive
To prove worthy of that trust.
I will give my full support
To upright public servants.
But those with unclean hands,
I will firmly oppose.
Each obligation that comes to me
As a true American,
I will discharge with honor.
My heart is in America
And America is in my heart.
I am an American.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein the short radio address referred to and the creed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. LELAND M. FORD]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief editorial appearing in the Bloch newspapers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SPRINGER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article which appeared in the National Grange Monthly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN]?

There was no objection.

CARL SCHURZ

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, Napoleon Bonaparte taught Europe a lesson in possibility of individual action which has never been forgotten. It was Napoleon who opened the door wide enough to show to the common people of Europe the incandescent rays of the lamp of liberty shining for all humankind. Himself an autocrat, dominated by vaulting ambition, treading like a giant among pygmies, crushing thrones, heaping coals of fire on the ashen breasts of dying despotisms, putting the washerwoman of yesterday at the head of a social regime, making marshals out of peasant soldiers, tossing dynasties into the discard, showing to the astonished world that rulers playing clown under the false colors of a right by divinity were merely plaster casts, this iconoclastic corporal from Corsica changed the manner of human thought, gave pinions to heretofore suppressed ideas of a government of the people, and liberty of conscience and worship.

Had it not been for Napoleon there might never have been a revolution in Germany in 1848 and 1849, and the United States of America would have been deprived of the enrichment of its literature and politics and its material wealth by those refugees who fled from tyranny and the black threat of the gibbet and prison cell. From the day the Little Corporal went across the seas to St. Helena to the hour of Bismarck and his iron policy, Germany was in a state of flux politically. Its masses had learned that it might have hope of liberty; that there was such a thing as government by the people; and that the term "citizen" meant more than a pawn with which kings might play. It was in this atmosphere within a castle's wall, where his grandfather lived as a retainer of a petty prince, that Carl Schurz, destined to be the greatest American citizen of German birth, was born March 2, 1829.

Carl Schurz came from a background of peasantry; he became a student with talent, he had an ambition to write history—the history of the lowly and abased. In him was something of the spirit which Victor Hugo gives Marius in Les Miserables; the spirit that has stirred every patriot heart since the beginning of time into a protest against tyranny. At 19 he was a revolutionist against the hypocrisy, the falsehood, and the ambition of Frederick William IV. It was an evil time. Men were murdered in the streets of Berlin. The civilians unloaded the bodies in the public square and called for the King to look. They made him take off his hat to the citizen assemblage. It was prophetic of what some day would come to the world when dictators would remove the hat to the people and bow in acquiescence to the will which has no master but its own.

But the promises were not kept. The King lied again. He had been forced by that intriguer for absolutism, Metternich, to rescind every act that in any manner gave emphasis to the power of the people and inspiration of hope for a government in which there was a mass voice instead of one. Metternich was unhorsed but Frederick William IV still stalked in panoply among his subjects. Carl Schurz, a student, was one of the orators of the time. At 19 he was able to sway great assemblages and gave promise of the day when with that same voice in a new and adopted country he would fight the battle for human freedom and help write the epilogue to slavery.

But it was to no definite purpose. The revolution failed. In its failure, in the black hour when there was no longer hope, even then, Schurz, the youth, still said:

I tried indeed to lift myself that so great, so just, so sacred a cause as that of German unity and free government could not possibly fail.

Carl Schurz in his zeal did heroic things. Again I turn to Les Miserables and the escape of Jean Valjean carrying the wounded Marius on his shoulders through the cloaca of Paris and find something of the same heroic, desperate fatalism in the escape of Carl Schurz from the castle where he was a prisoner, and again when he rescued his teacher and guide from prison.

At 20 Schurz's character was formed. In all this time he had one pattern—that was America, the Republic of the United States. It is not material for this address to tell the story of the years between the escape from Germany and his final determination to reach America, or how at 25 he stepped on the soil of the Nation in which he was so soon to be a great national figure.

He came to Watertown, Wis., among relatives. Naturally, he was interested in politics and policies. His friends and relatives at Watertown were Democrats. It was a common understanding that the Democratic Party was more kind to foreign peoples than the Whigs. There was no Republican Party. But he was an uncompromising abolitionist. To him the idea of a free nation existing with slavery in any part of it was anathema. He was induced to make speeches in German. In 1856, when Fremont was the Republican standard bearer, he blazed a path of righteous indignation over slavery as an institution in a score of speeches in German in the Wisconsin and Minnesota German settlements.

A year later, illy clad, trousers just over his boot tops, sleeves shiny, a picture of poverty as he was, he stood on the afternoon of Thursday, September 3, 1857, before the Republican State convention at Madison the nominee of the Republican Party of Wisconsin for Lieutenant Governor. From the Janesville Daily Gazette of that time I quote a few words of his speech:

"I am of that class of Germans who know that they owe a debt of honor to the old and a debt of gratitude to their new fatherland, and who, having fought in the battles of freedom in the old country, are aware that they stand here on the last bulwark of liberty in the world and are ready to defend it like the bravest of your own."

As Mr. Schurz concluded his eloquent remarks the convention arose as one man and gave three thundering cheers for Carl Schurz.

Thus came Carl Schurz into the arena of American political life. He began in the State of Wisconsin, where he is still honored. In 2 years he was the most asked-for orator of the time. He went down to Quincy, Ill., and heard Abraham Lincoln debate with Stephen A. Douglas. He spoke to great audiences in a half hundred cities. He was no tergiversator and no mincer of words. He had no tricks of story or banter. He was serious and earnest. He had overcome his struggle with the English language, and his first speech in English was The Irrepressible Conflict. He was prophetic in his belief that if slavery was not immediately removed as an issue by its own death there would be arbitrament with arms and in blood. The student of history finds here much to interest.

Honors were heaped upon him. He was a member of the Republican National Committee supporting Lincoln. He was a delegate to conventions. He had mastered English so well that he had all the idioms of the language, all the homely phrases of the American, all the accent which might have been excellent in a life long Yankee. He was a living American; why should he not live in its speech? He piled climax upon climax with inexorable logic and in either; his mother tongue was equally facile. He was an idealist. He had the honesty of fidelity, the courage of a righteous passion for truth, and a conviction that justice must eventually prevail.

He went to Spain as Minister; he came back and commanded a brigade under his old '48 compatriot, Franz Sigel. He was at Bull Run and Chancellorsville; he went with Howard to Chattanooga; he marched with Sherman to the sea, and north when Johnson surrendered. He returned to private life and as an editor of the Westliche Post, of St. Louis, and so called attention to his qualities that he was elected to the United States Senate.

He was still a revolutionist. He was not a reformer, as we know reformers. But 14 years before we had the corruption of Credit Mobilier and the scandals of the Belknap war administration he had stood before an audience in Albany Hall in Milwaukee and spoken of political corruption as no man ever had before. What he said then may apply today. It is as sound in 1940 as it was in 1858:

And I do not hesitate to prophesy that if the Republican Party should be unfortunate enough to entangle itself in the same network of corruption with which the Democracy is choking itself to death, the people will strike it down with the same crushing verdict under which Hunkerism is sinking now. And in that case, I confess my heart would behold with grief and sorrow its degradation, but it would have no tears for its defeat. * * * It is true we cannot expect every Republican to be a perfect angel. Even when advocating the purest principles, a man will not at once cast off all the frailties of human nature; and so it may happen, and I am sorry to say it has happened, that some Republicans in the discharge of official duties fell victims to severe temptations. But one thing we can do, we must do, and we shall do. We must not hesitate to denounce every member of our own party who prostitutes his trust and power by dishonest and corrupt transactions as a contemptible villain. And not only that, we must consider and denounce and treat him as a traitor to his party. What we can and must do is to make all dishonest and corrupt practices high treason, and to take every such traitor and pitch him overboard; to condemn him to political death without regard to person or station, without the benefit of clergy.

That was Carl Schurz. He was a revolutionist. He did not believe in opportunism. He started out as a sound-money man and was never led astray by the chimera of a debased currency. The "isms" and political exigencies that by statutory enactment would redeem mankind from whatever condition he found himself had no advocate and no attorney in Carl Schurz. He defied the Republican Party on many of its legislative acts. He was perhaps the original independent. Never in all this time did he labor for his own aggrandizement. He was punished for this by failure of reelection to the Senate. He was the father of the civil service in the National Government. The time had come when every clerkship and every janitor job was not to be given as political requitement.

He went to Europe and visited Bismarck. He was a welcome guest in the land from which, with a price on his head, he had been exiled by choice to America. There must have been a great satisfaction in sitting with the iron Chancelor and discussing Germany, its past, its present, and its future.

Faithful among the faithless, honest among the dishonest, seeking nothing that did not come to him from the incentive of other minds than himself, he returned to hold the portfolio of Secretary of the Interior under President Hayes. It was the last public office for him. He became wholly American; he surrendered completely to his adopted nationality. He died poor. He had no time to enrich himself. America must be thankful for the revolt of 1848. It gave to us a great American, a great people. It gave to Germany a great German. It gave to the world a brilliant example of a statesman.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, I present a privileged report (Rept. 1900), and send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that the Clerk read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities authorized by the House of Representatives by House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, caused to be issued a subpena directing one James H. Dolsen to appear before the said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities and to produce all records regarding Communist Party and activities; the subpena being set forth in words and figures as follows:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, to the Sergeant at Arms, or his special messenger: You are hereby commanded to summon James H. Dolsen, 1413 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., to be and appear before the Un-American Activities Special Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which the Honorable MARTIN DIES, of Texas, is chairman, and produce all records regarding Communist Party and activities in their chamber in the city of Washington, forthwith, then and there to testify touching matter of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee. Herein fail not, and make return of this summons. Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 22d day of March 1940. W. B. Bankhead, Speaker. Attest: South Trimble, Clerk.

Said subpena was on March 23, 1940, served upon the said James H. Dolsen by Robert B. Barker, an employee of the said Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities and duly authorized to serve the said subpena. The return of a service by the said Robert B. Barker being endorsed thereon which is set forth in words and figures as follows:

Subpena for James H. Dolsen (duces tecum) before the Committee on the Un-American Activities, served March 23, 1940, at 1413 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., on James Hulse Dolsen named herein. Robert B. Barker, Kenneth Romney, Sergeant at Arms, House of Representatives.

Said James H. Dolsen, pursuant to said subpena and in compliance therewith, appeared before the said committee to give such testimony and to produce such records as required under and by virtue of House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress.

Said James H. Dolsen, after being duly sworn by the chairman, gave testimony before the subcommittee of the said committee on the 25th day of March 1940, concerning certain matters and things, but refused to give testimony and to answer certain questions propounded to him on the following matters and things:

"The CHAIRMAN. The committee is sitting as a subcommittee composed of Mr. DEMPSEY, the chairman, and Mr. THOMAS. Ask your question.

"Mr. BARKER. Mr. Dolsen, do you know Sonia Strauss?
"Mr. DOLSEN. I know Sonia Strauss.
"Mr. BARKER. Is she a Communist?
"Mr. DOLSEN. I decline to answer that question.
"The CHAIRMAN. Ask the next question.
"Mr. BARKER. Do you know Joseph Chandler?
"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is requiring you to answer these questions.
"Mr. DOLSEN. I understand.
"The CHAIRMAN. And you decline to answer them?
"Mr. DOLSEN. That is right.
"The CHAIRMAN. Would you answer this question: Did you ever sit in a Communist meeting with Sonia Strauss?
"Mr. DOLSEN. I decline to answer that question.
"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires you to answer the question, and you decline?
"Mr. DOLSEN. That is right." (March 25, 1940. Record, p. 33.)
"Mr. BARKER. Do you know Alec Steinberg?
"Mr. DOLSEN. I do.
"Mr. BARKER. He is chairman of one of the units of the Communist Party in Allegheny County, is he not?
"Mr. DOLSEN. Not that I know of.
"Mr. BARKER. Is he a Communist?
"Mr. DOLSEN. I decline to state.
"Mr. BARKER. You decline to answer?
"Mr. DOLSEN. Yes.
"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requires you to answer the question, and you decline to answer it?
"Mr. DOLSEN. That is right." (March 25, 1940. Record, p. 34.)
"Mr. BARKER. Do you know who the chairmen are of the various units of the Communist Party in Allegheny County?
"Mr. DOLSEN. I know in some individual cases who the chairmen are.
"Mr. BARKER. Will you state the ones you do know?
"Mr. DOLSEN. If the committee please, I decline to answer that kind of a question, on the same basis as I declined the others.
"The CHAIRMAN. The committee understands that you decline to state who the chairmen are, the ones that you know in the various units of the Communist Party in Allegheny County.
"Mr. DOLSEN. That is right.
"The CHAIRMAN. Do you also decline to answer the question as to who the section organizers are?
"Mr. DOLSEN. That is right also.
"The CHAIRMAN. Do you know who they are?
"Mr. DOLSEN. In some cases I do.
"The CHAIRMAN. You decline to give the committee the names of any of them?
"Mr. DOLSEN. That is right." (March 25, 1940. Record, p. 42.)
"The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has considered that very carefully. Here is the case of a member of the Communist Party using the name of the President of the United States, using that name as a party name, apparently with the consent of the Communist Party, or, at least, without any objection, and the Chair thinks that it is material to find out who did that, because, manifestly, if that practice is permitted, it is very much against public interest. The Chair directs you to answer that question as to the name of the person who gave the name Franklin D. Roosevelt for party purposes.
"Mr. DOLSEN. Well, I will have to state to the committee that, on the previous grounds, I decline to give that information." (March 25, 1940. Record, p. 47.)

Because of the foregoing, the said subcommittee of the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities has been deprived of the testimony of said James H. Dolsen relative to the subject matter which, under House Resolution 282, Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued by House Resolution 26, Seventy-sixth Congress, and House Resolution 321, Seventy-sixth Congress, said subcommittee of the Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities was instructed to investigate; and the willful and deliberate refusal of the witness to testify further as hereinbefore set forth is a violation of the subpena under which the witness had previously appeared and testified, and his willful refusal to testify further without having been first excused as a witness deprives the subcommittee of the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities of necessary and pertinent testimony and places the said witness in contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The report just read is ordered printed. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 446

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the House of Representatives Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities as to the willful and deliberate refusal of James H. Dolsen to testify before a subcommittee of the said Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities, together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said James H. Dolsen may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. DUNN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, am I in order in asking permission to say a few words at this time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], chairman of the committee, is in charge of the resolution. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DIES. Yield for what purpose?

Mr. DUNN. I wish to ask a few important questions.

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DUNN. May I ask the gentleman from Texas, Is it not a fact that when Mr. Dolsen was interrogated he stated that he refused to answer because the Constitution did not compel him to do so?

Mr. DIES. He gave as one of the grounds of refusal, as I recall, constitutional grounds, but not whether or not it would tend to incriminate him. He refused to say that that was the ground for his refusal.

Mr. DUNN. I understand he did not say that, but is it not a fact he believed that by answering certain questions he would incriminate himself?

Mr. DIES. I specifically asked him if he refused to answer the question for fear that his answer might tend to incriminate him, and he said specifically that that was not the ground of his refusal.

Mr. DUNN. I will admit I was not present during the entire meeting, but when I was there I did not hear him make that statement.

Mr. DIES. I may say to the gentleman that we do not require witnesses to answer questions where they state, and have some justification for their position, that the answers might tend to incriminate them.

Mr. DUNN. One more question: I was there when the man was asked many questions about whether he knew So-and-So to be a Communist, and he said "Yes" or "No." For example, I was brought into the picture.

Mr. DIES. No; I do not believe the gentleman was brought in.

Mr. DUNN. May I say that the investigator asked Mr. Dolsen if he knew Richard A. Lawry, a Burgess of Homestead. The reply was "West Homestead." The question was asked, "Is he a Communist?" and the answer was "No." The question was asked, "Was he ever a Communist?" and he said "No." Because of that statement this man, who has seven children, has lost his job.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman is speaking of Mr. Lawry?

Mr. DUNN. Yes.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman came to the committee and stated that Mr. Lawry was entitled to be heard. We told the gentleman that we would hear him instantly. He is now in Washington, and we are preparing to hear him.

Mr. DUNN. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a radio address entitled "Women and Cancer" to be delivered by me this afternoon; also an address by Dr. Parran, the Surgeon General, on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

GUAM

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to chide any of you because of your vote against the commercial development of Guam this spring, but I do believe I should call attention to the fact that a very able editorial appeared in the Washington Evening Star on the 26th of this month, 3 nights ago. It would do your heart good to see what the Japanese are doing just 150 miles away from Guam, not on an island that they own but on one of the mandated islands given them after the World War just for administration. We refuse to develop something that is a real asset of our own, an island that we really own and to which we have all proprietary rights, yet here Japan, 150 miles away, is developing an island commercially in exactly the same way we asked that our development of Guam take place, by the dredging of the harbor. I really believe that when this question comes up next year most of my colleagues will see fit to vote for it, and I sincerely hope they will. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the editorial to which I have referred is as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of March 26, 1940]

JAPAN'S LITTLE JOKE

Japan's belated report on her administration of the mandate islands in the Pacific should prove enlightening—and altogether embarrassing—for those in Congress who were responsible for disapproving the Navy's plans for improvement of the harbor at Guam, our small but strategically important insular possession near the mandate groups. It now appears that while the critics of the Guam project have been expressing fears that harbor improvements at the island might offend Japan, the Japanese have been having a secret little joke at our expense. They have been very busy with some extensive harbor improvements of their own right in the vicinity of our island outpost—with utter unconcern as to whether Uncle Sam would like it or not. While anti-American elements in Japan were viewing with what must have been mock alarm our Navy's plans for dredging coral reefs from Guam's waters, "because Guam is less than 1,500 miles from Japan," Japanese engineers, under cover of strictest secrecy, were dredging a harbor and building a pier at Saipan, about 150 miles north of Guam. Other "harbor improvements" are under way or planned, according to Japan's report for 1938 to the League of Nations, a copy of which has just reached the State Department here.

We will have to take Japan's word for it that the improvements are for commercial purposes. No American is permitted to visit any of the more than 600 islands in the mandate groups. Strangers are not wanted there. The report showed that only 12 foreigners visited the islands in 1938 and none was an American. It will be recalled that only last year, when a fishing boat from Saipan was wrecked at Guam, the Japanese refused to permit an American vessel to return the survivors to Saipan. Instead, the American ship was met at sea by a boat from Saipan.

The report was especially significant by reason of an omission. Although the 1937 report stated specifically that no fortifications were being constructed on the islands there was no such assurance in the present statement, although it is contended here that Japan is obliged to refrain from fortifying them. Whether Japan might feel offended or not, she should be required to give this assurance without further delay. Her report is incomplete without it. And until a complete report is filed, Japan is in no position to protest about any open and aboveboard harbor improvements or even fortifications that we should wish to undertake at Guam.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein the editorial to which I referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Special Committee to Investigate the National Labor Relations Board may have until midnight tomorrow night to file an intermediate report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House during the coming week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, another cigar factory in my district has closed, throwing out of employment 100 employees. For every employee thrown out like this, about five people go on relief, or must find something else to do. I have a letter from an industrial man employing 600 people, who says, "Since I have been in business during 38 years, I have never felt less disposed to push ahead than I do now." This is all because the Labor Committee is on a sit-down strike, and refuses to take action and amend these laws.

The National Labor Relations Board has ordered certain cigar manufacturers in my district to pay back $33,000 to their employees. Just recently they ordered a cigar manufacturer to pay back $2,900, and everyone of the employees went back in his office the next day and laid their money down. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—SCOTT AGAINST EATON

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 2, I call up House Resolution 427.

The clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 427

Resolved, That Byron N. Scott was not elected a Member from the Eighteenth Congressional District of the State of California to the House of Representatives at the general election held November 8, 1938; and

Resolved, That Thomas M. Eaton was elected a Member from the Eighteenth Congressional District of the State of California to the House of Representatives at the general election held on November 8, 1938.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9109) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided between the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9109, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, 1941, with Mr. THOMASON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, at the outset I want to acknowledge my appreciation to the members of the subcommittee who served with me on this bill. They gave unselfishly of their time and attention and in every way cooperated to the end that an act acceptable alike to the District and the Congress might be evolved. There was no suggestion of partisanship nor of serious disagreement in the committee. Although we expedited our work as much as was consistent with conditions, the committee gave very thorough consideration to every phase of the District budget.

SCOPE OF THE BILL

The bill embraces all regular annual appropriations chargeable to revenues of the District of Columbia, including the permanent Federal contribution, and also appropriations on account of park areas under the jurisdiction of the National Park Service, the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, the Zoological Park, and for certain work being performed under the supervision of the Corps of Engineers.

APPROPRIATIONS AND ESTIMATES

The Budget estimates for the purposes contained in this bill will be found in detail beginning on page 911 of the 1941 Budget. In addition to these estimates additional supplemental estimates, which were contained in House Document 585 and House Document 668, were also considered by the committee. The original Budget and the supplemental estimates aggregated $49,609,418. The bill under consideration carries appropriations totaling $48,291,717, or a reduction, under the Budget estimates, of $1,317,701. The bill, however, is in excess of the 1940 appropriation by $222,510.

Summarizing the estimates and appropriations for 1941, classified by sources of revenue, it would be seen that the bill provides:

	Budget estimates, 1941	Amount in bill for 1941	Increase (+) or decrease (−), bill compared with Budget estimates
Payable from—
Gasoline-tax fund	$4,940,150	$4,918,990	−$21,160
Water revenues	2,542,980	2,244,830	−298,150

APPROPRIATIONS AND REVENUES

The total appropriated in this bill by the committee and chargeable to the general fund of the District of Columbia and the Federal contribution is $41,127,897. In addition there are other charges against the general fund contained in other appropriation bills, including deficiencies, judgments, and so forth, estimated at $1,310,203, and making a total estimated charge against the general fund for 1941 amounting to $42,438,100. The total general-fund revenues for the fiscal year 1941 are estimated to be $42,723,000. This leaves an estimated surplus for the fiscal year 1941 in the general fund of $284,900. However, it is estimated that there will be a deficit for the fiscal year 1940 amounting to $1,085,415, which, after deducting the probable surplus for the fiscal year 1941 amounting to $284,900, will leave a net deficit at the close of the fiscal year 1941 of $800,515, unless additional revenue is provided.

The total amount approved by the committee payable from the gasoline tax and motor-vehicle fund is $4,918,990. This fund is available only for use in connection with highway department and related expenditures. The estimated revenue available in the fund for 1941 is $4,987,388.

The committee has approved a total of $2,244,830 payable from the water fund of the District. This fund is available only for water department expenditures. The estimated revenue available in this fund for the fiscal year 1941 is $2,695,410. The committee has recommended in the bill a total of $2,244,830. If this amount is approved for the fiscal year 1941, there will remain in the fund at the close of that fiscal year the estimated sum of $450,580.

The estimated expenditures from trust funds, grants, and indefinite appropriations during the fiscal year 1941 amount to $3,873,021. This sum is $6,501,870 below the estimated expenditure of $10,375,691 for the fiscal year 1940. These expenditures are made under permanent law heretofore enacted by Congress and continue as such until modified or discontinued.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROMOTIONS

In accordance with the policy heretofore approved by the committee in its consideration of previous appropriation bills, and set forth in the committee report on the independent offices appropriation bill (H. Rept. 1515, 76th Cong.), the committee has eliminated all new money submitted in the estimates for within-grade promotions. The total amount eliminated in connection with this bill amounts to $47,820. The committee has also continued in the bill a provision contained in the current law which limits the administrative promotions which may be made from lapses to a total of $50,000 during the next fiscal year and provides that the amount which may be expended for reallocations shall not exceed $35,000.

PUBLIC WELFARE AND HEALTH INSTITUTIONS

The subcommittee made a personal inspection of each of the institutions coming under the jurisdiction of the Board of Public Welfare and also visited the two major hospitals—Gallinger Hospital and the Tuberculosis Sanatoria at Glendale, Md. A survey of several of the institutions which have been under severe criticism within the past few months was also made by a group of responsible citizens of Washington, who were asked to study and report as to the situation at these places. Also, a person experienced and skilled in the matter of social service and welfare conditions in general was asked to come to Washington and make a careful study of the situation. The Board of Public Welfare and the director were heard, and numerous citizens appeared in connection with these institutions. We are of the opinion that conditions should be improved at three of the institutions under the Board of Public Welfare. The recommendations, which will be discussed in more detail later, reflect the composite opinion of the various groups which have cooperated with the committee in its attempt to improve conditions at these institutions.

DEPARTMENT OF INSPECTIONS

In addition to the denial of funds for additional promotions in this office, the committee has disallowed $1,440 for a clerk in the electrical division. The committee is of the opinion that the existing clerical staff is adequate to take care of the work.

CARE OF DISTRICT BUILDINGS

For the care of buildings under the control and operation of the District the bill provides a total of $191,210, which is $56,070 in excess of the 1940 appropriation and $9,080 less than the Budget estimates. We have made a net reduction of $10,780 in the item for fuel, light, and power for the District buildings. The reduction of this amount will leave a total of $90,340 for the next fiscal year, which is $38,260 in excess of the 1940 appropriation.

BOARD OF TAX APPEALS

In recommending $14,040 for the Board of Tax Appeals, which is the amount of the current appropriation, I wish to call attention to the fact that this Board is composed of a single member without any considerable training and experience in matters of property valuation, who is called upon to review and adjust assessments fixed by the Board of Assessors, which has the experience, background, and information to do a better job than anyone else.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION

There is recommended for this Commission an appropriation of $69,920, which is $500 less than the current appropriation and $4,280 below the Budget estimates.

CONTINGENT AND MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES

For contingent and miscellaneous expenses for the District, such as printing and binding, postage, advertising, and so forth, the bill allows a total of $281,360, which is $34,779 below the 1940 appropriation and $4,949 under the Budget estimates.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

For the operation and maintenance of the Free Public Library the committee considered estimates totaling $792,670 and allowed appropriations amounting to $778,540, which is $230,950 more than the 1940 appropriation and $14,130 less than the Budget estimates. The substantial increase over the current appropriation is due almost entirely to the allowance of $200,000 for continuing construction of the new main library building, for which an unexpended balance of $350,000 was made available in the current act. This second appropriation, which is recommended in the bill, will carry forward the project, to be constructed over a 3-year period, leaving a total of $568,000 unappropriated for completion of the project.

SEWERS

For the continuation of this work we recommend a total of $1,198,560, which is an increase of $65,760 over the 1940 appropriation and $55,350 below the Budget estimates. This reduction in the estimate is applied primarily to funds for the construction of sewers, including assessment and permit work in connection with such construction, the committee having recommended a cut of $25,000 in each item.

COLLECTION AND DISPOSAL OF REFUSE

A total of $1,502,180 is contained in the bill for the collection and disposal of refuse, which is $35,230 in excess of the current appropriation and $76,020 below the Budget estimates. We allowed increases in the estimates of $12,030 for street cleaning and snow removal and an increase of $24,000 over the current appropriation of $896,000 for the disposal of refuse, which includes the operation of two incinerators. These increases are provided to take care of the normal expansion of work due to the growth of the city.

We eliminated from the bill an estimate of $75,000 for the purchase of a site for a new high-temperature incinerator to be located somewhere in the northeast section of the city.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS

In the consideration of funds to be provided for the public schools the committee had before it estimates totaling $13,275,312. We recommend a total of $12,778,773, which represents a decrease of $590,385 under the 1940 appropriation and is $496,539 less than the Budget estimates.

For the salaries of administrative and supervisory officers the committee allowed $706,950, which is $17,147 in excess of the current appropriation and $800 less than the estimates. We denied $6,400 for the employment of two heads of vocational guidance, at $3,200 each, and transferred to this fund $5,600, the salary of one first assistant superintendent of community center and recreation activities.

We made a reduction of $8,800 in the estimate of $7,338,994 for teachers and librarians, the reduction being due to the allowance of additional funds under the industrial home school for the carrying out of an educational program under the direction of the head of that institution.

Under care of buildings and grounds additional funds have been requested in the estimates for personnel for the operation and maintenance of the Calvin Coolidge Senior High School and the Thomas Jefferson Senior High School, and the committee has recommended personnel which it considers sufficient to operate these two schools.

For the current year an appropriation of $312,500 was provided for fuel, light, and power, and at that time responsible officials urged that a total of $325,000 would be required. It is now estimated that during the current fiscal year a total of only $293,741 will be expended. In view of this fact we have allowed $300,000.

For contingent expenses there is allowed $155,000, which is $18,905 less than the Budget estimate and $5,000 in excess of the current appropriation.

The committee considered estimates totaling $313,843 for furniture and equipment, $4,800 being contained in House Document 668, which proposed that sum as an additional amount for completing the furnishing of the Banneker Junior High School. The committee has allowed $4,500 for this latter purpose and recommends a reduction of $19,043 in the original Budget estimate of $309,043.

A total of $476,585 was considered by the committee for repairs and improvements, including an estimate of $11,100 for repairs and improvements, and equipment for the health school on Thirteenth near Allison Street. For this latter purpose the committee has allowed $9,000.

During hearings on the bill the committee was advised that at the present time there are enrolled in the public schools of the District between 2,700 and 2,800 students who reside in nearby Maryland and Virginia, and that last year it cost about $265,000, computed on the basis of per pupil costs, to educate these children. This burden should not be borne by the taxpayers of the District, and we have inserted in the bill a corrective provision requiring the payment of tuition for such children. It should be pointed out, however, that this provision will not affect pupils now enrolled, but will prohibit future enrollment of children for free instruction and will gradually correct the situation over a period of years.

The building projects included in the bill, together with the limit of cost in each instance where such authorization is recommended, are as follows:

Building	Appropriation in the bill	Limit of cost
Syphax School	$95,000	$190,000
Junior high school in vicinity of 17th and Q Sts. SE	445,000	881,850
Vocational school to replace Abbott Vocational School	250,000	500,000
Preparation of plans and specifications for senior high school at 24th St. and Benning Rd. NE	20,000	900,000

In connection with the provision for the purchase of two building sites, the committee has recommended $40,000 instead of $47,000 as contained in the Budget. It is believed that the former sum will be adequate to acquire the land necessary for these purposes.

METROPOLITAN POLICE

A total of $3,306,480 was considered in the Budget estimates for the salaries and expenses of the Metropolitan Police force for the fiscal year 1941. The bill carries $3,301,785, which is $85,850 less than the current appropriation and $4,695 below the estimates.

We deducted $2,000 from the estimate of $18,000 for repairs and improvements to police stations, $1,000 from the estimate of $77,150 for contingent expenses, and $1,700 from the estimate of $66,700 for the purchase of motor vehicles.

FIRE DEPARTMENT

In recommending a total appropriation of $2,353,095 for this activity the committee has provided funds which are $29,895 less than the 1940 appropriation and $11,910 less than the Budget estimates, such reductions being made in operation and maintenance items, and due primarily to the consolidation of stations made pursuant to the provisions of the 1940 District of Columbia Appropriation Act.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT

For the Health Department including the Tuberculosis Sanatoria and the Gallinger Hospital, there is allowed a total of $2,540,600, which is $31,740 more than the 1940 appropriation and $33,600 less than the Budget estimates.

For medical services there is allowed $399,870, which is $2,990 less than the Budget estimates and a like amount under the 1940 appropriation. Denial of funds for step-ups, the disallowance of one nurse at $1,800 per annum, and $250 for medical supplies for the new southwest health center account for the reductions in this item.

We recommend $20,000 for furnishing and equipping the new southwest health center instead of $21,000, as proposed by the Budget, and have eliminated the Budget proposal for $13,000 to be used to purchase a site for a health center in southwest Washington. The committee is of the opinion that this proposal should be deferred until the school-replacement program is undertaken, at which time one or more sites ideally located for this purpose will be available without additional cost to the District.

The committee recommend an appropriation of $638,960 for the operation and maintenance of Tuberculosis Sanatoria, which is $11,592 in excess of the 1940 appropriation and $3,920 less than the Budget estimates. An increase of $37,592 over the current appropriation is allowed for personal services in order to place employees in the nursing and dietetic departments on a 44-hour week. Such employees are at present on an average of 49½ or 50 to 50 or 56 hour week.

For personal services at Gallinger Hospital there is allowed $675,000, which is $75,660 in excess of the 1940 appropriation and $12,840 less than the Budget estimates. Increases allowed by the committee will provide necessary personnel for two new buildings and will also be applied to the program of reducing the working hours of hospital personnel.

During hearings on the bill the committee inquired into the number and amount of fees charged patients in the two local District-operated hospitals and gave particular attention to the tuberculosis hospital at Glenn Dale, Md. The committee was informed that at this institution an average of about 25 patients are paying for hospitalization at the rate of from $1 to $2 per day. The impression was obtained by the committee during this discussion that too little attention is given to this question and that more careful investigation and regulation would produce greater revenue to the District.

The committee has restored an item providing $5,000 for general repairs and improvements to Columbia Hospital which was eliminated by the Budget from the 1941 estimates. The District has for years been making a contribution toward the maintenance of this institution but we feel that inasmuch as the land is owned by the United States Government and the buildings were constructed by the Federal Government and the District of Columbia that consideration should be given to the advisability of turning the property over to the District to be operated as a municipal institution or for such other purposes as may be found desirable. The property seems to be valued at around a half million dollars and I can see no reason why the Government should subsidize a privately operated hospital in any such manner.

COURTS

Practically no changes in the appropriations made for the juvenile court, police court, and the municipal court have been made. The aggregate appropriation is $3,118 less than the 1940 item and $928 less than the Budget estimates.

PUBLIC WELFARE

Turning now to the Department of Public Welfare, I want to reiterate what has been said about the personal inspection made of every one of the institutions by the members of the subcommittee. While conditions were found to be far from desirable, it must here be said that they were not nearly so bad as has been painted. The chief difficulty has not been lack of funds but the failure to use available moneys in the wisest and most beneficial way. Or, to put it another way, the trouble has been directional and not monetary.

A total of $7,473,925 is allowed for the several activities and agencies comprising the public-welfare service. This sum is $123,100 more than the 1940 appropriation and $20,630 less than the Budget estimates.

For personal services we recommend $149,900, an increase of $5,370 in the current appropriation and $7,160 in excess of the Budget figure. Aside from the deduction of $1,440 for administrative promotions, we have increased the estimate by $6,500 to provide for a principal Assistant Director of Public Welfare and a stenographer at $1,440 per annum. This principal assistant director is to be a capable officer who will devote his entire time to the inspection and administration of the public-welfare institutions of the District, which will be under his immediate supervision and for which he will be responsible. It is the recommendation of the committee that this officer keep in constant touch with conditions at the institutions and visit them at frequent intervals. The committee feels that the fixing of responsibility on one qualified official who will devote his entire time to this duty will do much toward eliminating the unsatisfactory conditions which have existed in several of the institutions.

The receiving home was visited by the members of the committee. The quarters in which this institution is housed are unsuited for the purpose both as to size and arrangement, and it is recommended that the Commissioners give consideration to the location of a new home as soon as the financial condition of the District will permit. The committee believes that immediate steps should be taken to separate delinquent from nondelinquent children who are now housed together in the present home, and to that end we have allowed funds and inserted a proviso to the appropriation for board and care of children, which will permit the continuous operation and maintenance of two foster homes for the temporary board and care of nondelinquent children. This provision will take care of all children of the nondelinquent class and will correct one of the outstanding causes of complaint against the institution.

For personal services at the jail the committee has allowed $101,580, which is $8,280 less than the estimates and $3,360 more than the 1940 appropriation.

The committee considered a supplemental estimate in the sum of $64,000 for the completion of an addition to the jail, for which $250,000 has been provided heretofore. The estimate also proposed an increase in the limit of cost of this building from $250,000 to $314,000. In allowing $44,000 for completion of the building the committee has disapproved an expenditure of the remaining $20,000 in the estimate intended for use in providing a walled enclosure for the jail yard as not justifying the expenditure involved. In line with the reduction in the estimate the committee has recommended a cut in the proposed limit of cost to $294,000.

Members of the committee who visited the workhouse and reformatory were favorably impressed with the efficient administration of the affairs of these institutions. The so-called prison industries are well planned and organized and are being carried on under intelligent direction. Discipline among the prisoners is good and the physical condition of the plant is excellent.

We found that the institutions at Lorton are now purchasing their power from local utilities at what we consider an exorbitant price and asked the superintendent to submit a preliminary survey as to the economies which could be effected by the installation of a Diesel or a steam power plant. The preliminary report is shown in the printed hearings. It is suggested that the District Commissioners direct the appropriate authorities to make a careful and detailed study of this question for the purpose of determining whether a plant should be erected. On the basis of a casual study it appears that from one-third to one-half the annual power bill may be saved and the cost of the new installation amortized over a period of 20 years or less.

With the exception of a reduction of $2,350 in the estimate of $481,350 for maintenance and supplies for the institution and an item of $25,000 for a new bakery building, the committee has allowed other estimates as submitted.

Members of the committee who visited the National Training School for Girls were of the opinion that conditions were not satisfactory at the institution and that definite improvements could be made from the standpoint of sanitation and educational opportunities. It is believed this situation could be corrected by additional supervision and with a small additional expenditure for repairs and improvements. To carry into effect these recommendations the committee has provided for a superintendent at $3,800 per annum to be appointed by the Board of Public Welfare with the approval of the Commissioners, $1,620 is allowed for an employee to serve as instructor of vocational education, and $1,800 additional is provided for medical supplies, farm supplies, repairs, and temporary labor. Other increases, including one parole officer and one watchman, are allowed by the committee as provided in the estimates.

The committee at the District Training School found general conditions were fairly good. Some improvements as to segregation of inmates by classes and ages can undoubtedly be effected, and better care of the ground surrounding the building would greatly enhance the appearance of the institution. With the exception of a reduction of $5,000 in the estimate of $110,000 for maintenance of the institution, the committee has allowed funds for this school as submitted in the Budget estimates.

The committee members who visited the Industrial Home School were of the opinion that general supervision and administration was satisfactory but that improvements could be effected insofar as the educational program was concerned and that a small additional sum for repairs and improvements was urgently needed. Teachers from the public schools are at present detailed to this institution for the purpose of instructing inmates. The committee believes that the educational program should be carried on by resident teachers directly under the supervision and control of the superintendent and that vocational training should be emphasized. To accomplish this purpose the committee has provided $7,570 for four teachers, including one part-time instructor in vocational education who will be appointed by the Board of Public Welfare. An increase of $1,600 in the estimate of $23,500 for maintenance is allowed for the purchase of equipment to put the vocational program into effect. An increase of $1,500 in the estimate of $5,000 for repairs and improvements will permit the correction of faulty plumbing, improve sanitary conditions, and provide for painting and repair to roofs.

In view of the publicity which has been given conditions at the home for aged and infirm, the committee has paid especial attention to the problem, and members of the committee have made visits to it on different occasions. The committee is of the opinion that most of the criticism leveled against the institution can be corrected by improvement in the supervision and direction of affairs at the home and by a modest increase in personnel to meet existing deficiencies. While the present superintendent of the home has rendered excellent service over a long period of years, the burdens of the work have increased to a point where it is imperative that additional supervisory personnel be provided. To meet this condition the committee has made provision in the bill for a superintendent at $4,600 per annum. The total new personnel allowed by the committee, including three new employees contained in the Budget estimates, is as follows:

	Increases
Superintendent	$4,600
2 nurses	3,260
Resident physician	3,800
Stenographer	1,440
7 hospital attendants	8,820
3 attendants	3,780
Total	25,700

To provide needed repairs to existing structures, the committee has added $7,350 to the estimate of $5,000 submitted in the Budget. Appropriations for public assistance, which include general relief, home care for dependent children, assistance against old-age want, and pensions for needy blind persons, totaling $1,678,000, are approved as provided in the estimates. The committee has also approved the proposal of the Budget earmarking $49,960 of funds for public assistance for use in certifying persons eligible for work relief and surplus commodities.

The committee has inserted in the bill the sum of $15,000 to provide for the education of handicapped or shut-in children. For the past 2 years this work has been carried on by the Work Projects Administration, which has announced that this work cannot be continued after July 1 next. While the sum provided in the bill is somewhat less than the amount provided from emergency funds, the committee feels that it is the maximum which can be allowed for this purpose and that it is sufficient to do a reasonably good job, especially if attention is given to assembling some of the less handicapped children into small groups at regular intervals. This program should be carried on with the cooperation of the public-school authorities.

MILITIA

Aside from the disallowance of $120 for administrative promotions, the sum provided for general expenses in connection with the local militia is the same as provided in the estimates and the current law—$48,880. The committee recommends a reduction of $200,000 in the estimate of $1,300,000 for continuation of construction of the new armory building. This reduction will have no effect on the date of completion of the building, which is being constructed under a 3-year program. During the fiscal year 1942 the sum of $1,150,000 will be required to complete construction of the project.

PUBLIC PARKS

For the several activities making up this appropriation there is recommended $919,842, which is $27,951 less than the 1940 appropriation and $7,280 less than the estimates. With the exception of the disallowance of $1,680 for administrative promotions and the deduction of the salary of the recreation coordinator—$5,600—who has been transferred to the public-school pay roll, the funds recommended for this work are the same as proposed in the estimates.

NATIONAL ZOOLOGICAL PARK

Other than the elimination of funds for promotions, the committee has approved the Budget estimate for this activity. The committee wishes to call attention to the amount set up against this appropriation for telephone charges, which it regards as entirely too large, and recommends that the matter be given study with a view to bringing it in line with essential requirements.

HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT

For the several activities provided for under this fund there is recommended $4,918,990, which is $241,765 less than the 1940 appropriation and $21,160 less than the Budget estimates. The committee has provided an additional electrician at $1,800 per annum to assist in the repair of traffic lights.

In connection with the estimate of $943,000 for repairs to streets, snow removal, and so forth, the committee has allowed $922,500 in recommending a reduction of $20,500 in the item. The increase of $72,500 over the current appropriation, which is approved by the committee will provide additional funds for snow removal and snow-removal equipment. In this connection, $25,000 is provided for the purchase of snow plows, and $12,500 is for the purchase of small tractors especially equipped for snow-removal purposes. Eighteen thousand dollars is provided to reimburse funds used to meet emergency snow-removal expenditures during the current year, leaving $42,000 in the fund for labor in connection with snow removal during the next fiscal year.

With the approval of the Commissioners the committee has also inserted in the bill a provision making the sum of $15,000 available from the street-repair fund for the preparation of plans and specifications for an underpass in line of Sixteenth Street NW., at Scott Circle. This project is shown as being especially urgent owing to the congestion of traffic at this point since the opening of the new underpass at Fourteenth Street and Thomas Circle. It is estimated the project will cost nearly $400,000.

WATER SERVICE

For the general services operating under the Water Department and payable from water-fund revenues, including the laying of water mains, the installation of meters, and so forth, there is recommended $2,244,830, which is $194,570 less than the 1940 appropriation and $298,150 less than the Budget estimates.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. O'NEAL. I would just like to make the statement that when the consideration of this bill was first mentioned there was some reluctance on the part of some Members to serve on the committee because of its controversial nature and because of the existence of many other duties which they felt were more of an obligation. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. TAYLOR, selected the gentleman from Florida and asked him to serve as the chairman of the committee, and through a fine spirit of service, almost of self-sacrifice, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL], accepted the chairmanship of the committee. Those of us who served with him were very much gratified by the way he handled the work, by his intelligence and conscientious approach to the job, and we feel that the Congress and the District of Columbia have been highly favored in having the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL] as chairman of the District of Columbia Subcommittee. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful for the kind words of the gentleman from Kentucky, but I must say that the work which has been done on this bill has been done by the committee, by the members who voluntarily offered their services and who have done a good job. They have worked hard, rapidly, and faithfully. [Applause.]

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, as ranking member of the minority subcommittee making appropriations for the District of Columbia, I wish to take this opportunity of telling you of my appreciation for the courtesy extended to me by our chairman, the gentleman from Florida, the Honorable MILLARD F. CALDWELL, and other members on this committee who include the gentleman from Texas, Hon. GEORGE H. MAHON; the gentleman from Kentucky, Hon. EMMET O'NEAL; the gentleman from Michigan, Hon. LOUIS C. RABAUT; the gentleman from Kansas, Hon. JOHN M. HOUSTON; the gentleman from South Dakota, Hon. FRANCIS H. CASE; and the gentleman from Kansas, Hon. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON. I wish also to add a word of appreciation for the valuable assistance given to us by Mr. William Duval, our committee clerk.

This is the second time I have had the privilege of working on appropriations for the District, and, while it contains very little interest so far as the people of my own congressional district are concerned, I feel that it is an honor to serve on a committee which has to do with the appropriating of funds to carry on the functions of the government of our Nation's Capital. This bill takes in all the regular annual appropriations charged to the revenue of the District, including the permanent Federal contribution of the $6,000,000, over which there has been so much controversy in the past. This amount has ranged from five millions up to nine millions of dollars, and in spite of many surveys no one has yet informed Congress just what the proper amount should be, in my opinion. Anyway, members of the committee should know that this bill carried over $48,000,000, in which their own taxpayers have an interest in the Federal contribution of $6,000,000, plus other Federal benefits which are not reflected in this bill. Compared with the Budget estimate, the bill shows a decrease of $1,317,701.

In my opinion, there is no other appropriation bill which comes before this House each year which attracts more attention of the people in the District of Columbia than does the bill which we bring before you at this time. It comes to you in finished form after a most careful study and consideration by every member of this committee. It comes to you after a diligent study of each item and after a personal survey of many of the institutions which are located here. The committee brings this bill to you after holding intensive hearings and making it possible for everyone interested in the city to appear before the committee and state their views on various matters.

As is the case in other appropriation bills, your committee members are forced necessarily to depend upon the information and justifications brought to them by the various officers in charge of the various departments of the city government. In this work we were greatly aided by Maj. Dan Donovan, the District auditor, who, I believe, knows more about the District financial problems than any other individual in the city. The committee has gone further this year by making personal investigations and securing information direct from many citizens directly interested and directly affected by taxation. Until the taxpayers and citizens of this city secure a more direct benefit toward securing the privilege of saying how their tax money shall be expended, I feel that this committee has gone the limit in taking the feelings of the local public opinion and of the citizens into consideration before reaching its conclusions.

So far as I know, there is very little controversy in this bill, and it comes to you with the unanimous report of the committee. The hearings contain 559 pages of valuable information, which will indicate to you the length to which the committee went in securing information in order to be fair regarding the wishes of the citizens. The report will give to you explanations on some of the items which will show some changes compared with the items contained in the bill a year ago. I specifically call your attention to the items regarding education, public health, and public assistance, and the construction items. A close study of the hearings will indicate to you why the newspapers recently have stated that Washington is the third city in the United States in the point of new construction.

Evidence brought before us will indicate that this city and greater Washington is continuing to experience a boom and that thousands of people from all parts of the country are being attracted here because of the gigantic pay roll. As a result of this gigantic growth of the city, taxpayers find that quite a bit of their money goes toward benefits for individuals, which should be borne by taxpayers of other States, largely by the States bordering the District of Columbia. This is brought out by the fact that a year ago 2,400 pupils came to Washington from Maryland and Virginia and secured free tuition. Today that number has jumped to around 2,800, and in reply to a question, the Superintendent of Schools told the committee that the taxpayers of the District of Columbia are forced to pay $265,000 for tuition for children that should be the responsibility of nearby States. Free medical attention, free hospitalization, and other benefits here are also going to many of the people who should be the responsibility of neighboring States, and just how much of the Federal contribution goes toward these expenditures has not been determined. Yet it is safe to say that the Federal contribution to the District of Columbia government in which money paid by taxpayers in Nebraska and other States in the Union is represented, does find its way into these various expenditures.

Until some other means of appropriating funds for the District is found and until the people in the city who actually pay the bill are given more freedom and more responsibility and right to determine how their money should be spent, this Congress must act as a sort of a city council for the Nation's Capital, and your Subcommittee on Appropriations must do the best it knows how in giving fair treatment to the citizens here. Mr. Chairman, I am proud of my Nation's Capital, and like other Members and other citizens of this Nation, I am very happy to know that every effort is being made on the part of the various agencies in charge to make it the most beautiful capital city in the world. I feel every member of the committee feels the same way about it, but I know they also feel that eventually the citizens here—the taxpayers—will bring about some change in order that they will carry on their responsibility so far as the expenditure of their own money is concerned, and that something will develop in the near future whereby the taxpayers of the other States of the Union will not feel that they are in any way unjustly being taxed for the many benefits derived by the people here.

People in the various States in the Union may not realize that the city of Washington is now probably the fastest growing city in the United States. The fact that the Nation's Capital is located here is the only reason. I make this statement on the basis of facts printed in a recent issue of the Washington Evening Star, which is admitted by every newspaperman here to be the best newspaper published in Washington, and, in fact, one of the best newspapers in the United States. I feel sure that most of the people in the United States would now be happy to have the Capitol of our country located in their city. I know we people in Nebraska would like to have the Capitol in our State. We who have suffered droughts, insect plagues, and so on, would be glad to have some of the benefits which pour into this city as the result of the Capital being located here. So far as I am concerned, I feel that Washington has never felt a depression such as we have been feeling in the State of Nebraska. Let me tell you some of the benefits Washington is receiving as they are shown by the Washington Star:

> Washington leads the Nation in concentration of buying power, with private and Government pay rolls ranging between $43,000,000 and $50,000,000 a month. The magazine Sales Management estimates annual income in the District of Columbia at $3,867 per family, higher than for any other area.
> Population of the Washington metropolitan area has increased to approximately 950,000, compared with only 621,059 in the 1930 Federal census. Utility connections indicate a gain of 150,000 persons in the last 4 years.

Washington retail trade volume exceeded $400,000,000 for the first time in history during 1939. Department-store sales swept 3.5 percent ahead of their previous all-time high peak set in 1937 and were 18.2 percent ahead of the 1929 levels.

The rapid building pace necessary to meet greatly expanded needs for housing has attracted Nation-wide attention. More than 13,000 families were provided for in the last year in the metropolitan area. Since the beginning of 1935 more than 50,500 families have been provided for within the same boundaries.

Washington has more telephones in ratio to its population than any other city in the world. At the end of 1939 there were 254,042 connections in the District of Columbia itself. There were 311,027 connections in the metropolitan area.

With approximately 263,000 automobiles in the metropolitan area, Washington is an outstanding market for automotive products. Gasoline consumption in the District of Columbia alone jumped during 1939 to another new record of 143,000,000 gallons.

Millions of people from all over the Nation visit their National Capital every year. Visitors at Smithsonian Institution, mecca of tourists, totaled 2,542,268 during 1939, another new record.

Consumption of electric power and gas forged into new high ground during the year. The home-appliance industry rates Washington one of its most highly developed markets.

[Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. In view of the fact that this measure has to do with the finances of the District of Columbia, is the committee influenced to any great extent by the press references that are made to various items that come up in this bill?

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for asking that question, because I know that every Member in the House, when he picks up a local newspaper about a month before the appropriation bill is made up for the District of Columbia, finds a mass of news stories, with great headlines, calling our attention to the various ills of the District of Columbia, but let me tell the gentleman something else. I welcome the information in the press, be cause I bleieve that is the only means that the people in the District of Columbia have to express their wishes. They have no other way of expressing their wishes in the District of Columbia, and the molding of opinion here is largely done through the newspapers which perform a great service to the taxpayers in the District who cannot become vocal in any other way.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have listened with interest to the colloquy between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN] upon the subject of certain newspaper articles which might be brought to bear and exert an influence on appropriation bills for the District of Columbia. I think perhaps the gentleman will agree with me also that the District of Columbia Committee, charged with legislation for this jurisdiction, at times is criticized because we appoint subcommittees to make inquiry and survey certain ills or bad conditions that are brought to us for our consideration. The most recent investigation along this line is one in which, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. D'ALESANDRO], looked into the welfare and hospital situation of the city. The gentleman from Nebraska realizes, I feel sure, that we do well to investigate outstanding complaints which are brought to our attention.

Mr. STEFAN. Oh, the gentleman is absolutely right. His committee performs a valuable work, but I wish to make the record plain that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] was not criticizing. He was seeking information as to how these matters are brought to the attention of the Congress, and had it not been for information brought to us in various newspaper articles, I am sure very little attention would be given to some particular things that Congress would not have the time to investigate. I know that the legislative committee has done wonderful work.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. Yes.

Mr. RABAUT. I rise to say a word in comment of the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska and his devotion to this city. A moment ago he was paying favorable comment to members of the committee. The gentleman from Nebraska has been with the committee for some time, and his knowledge of District affairs is indeed great. I am wondering at this time if it would not be very appropriate for the Committee to have as a matter of record in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the appreciation of the committee of Major Donovan.

Mr. STEFAN. Interrupting the gentleman, I am in accord with him and in fact in the extension of my remarks the gentleman will find a commendation of Major Donovan who, I believe, knows more about the District's financial affairs than any other man in Washington.

Mr. RABAUT. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. STEFAN. I agree with the gentleman from Michigan who has worked so hard on these bills and I thank him for the help he has given us; but going further into the matter of these newspaper articles, I answer the gentleman from Massachusetts and say yes, they do reflect not only in legislation, but in the appropriation bill, and the bill we have before us carries a considerable reflection of some of the things brought to the attention of Congress and the public in general by the newspapers of Washington.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

THE TREADWAY RESOLUTION FOR THE CREATION OF A FEDERAL TAX COMMISSION

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, my remarks today are addressed to a joint resolution which I have had pending for some time which proposes the creation of a nonpartisan Federal Tax Commission, representing both the Congress and the general public, to make a thorough study of the Federal tax structure and recommend much-needed reforms.

The President of the United States is authority for the statement that taxes in this country "have grown up like Topsy." That is one of the principal faults of our present tax structure. Our tax laws are a veritable hodgepodge. They have been enacted at odd times over a long period of years, and piled one upon the other. They are not part of any integrated or coordinated plan of taxation. They do not adhere uniformly to sound tax principles. Too little consideration has been given to their effect upon taxpayers and the national economy. The Federal and State Governments have gradually encroached upon each other's spheres of taxation, thereby bringing about multiple taxes of the same character.

I share the opinion of many that it is high time we took our Federal tax system apart and rebuilt it along more satisfactory lines. We should endeavor to develop a long-range, well-balanced, equitable, and simplified scheme of taxation which will meet the legitimate revenue needs of the Government without unduly burdening the citizen or business enterprise.

The revision of our tax system is one of our most pressing national problems. It is a subject which is of vital interest to every man, woman, and child, and every business concern in the country. It is said that from death and taxes there is no escape, and this is literally true. Those taxes which we do not pay directly to the tax collector we pay indirectly in the increased cost of goods and services, and the fact is that these unseen or hidden taxes make up the greater share of our present tax burden.

In my resolution, I propose what I conceive to be generally desirable tax policies to guide the Commission in its studies. These policies have received the personal indorsement of the Secretary of the Treasury, as appears from a colloquy which I had with him in the course of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on the 1939 tax bill. I shall ask unanimous consent to include brief extracts from these hearings at the conclusion of my remarks.

Now what are these tax policies which I propose, and which the Secretary of the Treasury has indorsed? I shall refer to them, one by one, and make short comments thereon.

STABLE TAX POLICY NEEDED

First, it is proposed that Congress establish a stable, more permanent Federal tax policy. Right now we do not seem to have any definite tax policy, or if any exists, it certainly is not a very stable one. Every year since 1932 we have had a tax bill of some sort. Whether we have one this year is as yet uncertain. In the last 5 years, corporations have been subjected to five different kinds of taxation—and still we wonder why we have business uncertainty. Under the act of 1934, all corporations paid a flat tax on their net income. In 1935, a graduated corporation income tax was enacted, which was to apply to the taxable year 1936 and subsequent years. In 1936, before any taxes had been collected under the graduated tax, the iniquitous undistributed-profits tax was passed, which completely revolutionized corporate taxation. In 1938, as a result of public criticism, this tax was drastically amended, and we had a graduated income tax on small corporations and a modified undistributed-profits tax on large corporations. The latter tax was superseded last year by a flat tax on net income. Business can usually adjust itself to any reasonable burden if it knows what it is going to be, but it is this constant change and fear of further change that has in a large measure contributed to the present state of uncertainty. If we adopt a fixed tax policy, we can adjust the rates upward or downward to meet changing revenue needs.

BURDENSOME TAXES SHOULD BE AVOIDED

Second, it is proposed that we raise the necessary revenue for the support of the Government with the least possible burden on individual taxpayers and business enterprises. While taxes are a necessary evil, care should be taken that they do not oppress or unduly burden the taxpayer. This is one of the outstanding purposes of the resolution.

EXCESSIVE RATES CAUSE REVENUE SHRINKAGE

Third, it is proposed that due regard be given to the natural economic law of diminishing returns in fixing tax rates. We have learned by experience that there is a point beyond which a higher rate of taxation produces not more, but less, revenue. In the opinion of many, the upper brackets of the surtax, which take as much as 79 cents out of the taxpayer's dollar, have already reached that point. Excessive taxes not only dry up the sources of revenue, but they tend to drive capital out of productive enterprise, to the great detriment not only of workers but of the Nation as a whole. The President has well stated that excessive taxes

> Are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms, and * * * in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain.

During the twenties we found that we could raise more money by reasonable taxes than we could by taxes that stifled business and took too large a share of the purchasing power of the people. We should profit by that example.

TAXES SHOULD BE BASED ON ABILITY-TO-PAY PRINCIPLE

Fourth, it is proposed that Federal taxes be based, insofar as practicable and expedient, upon the principle of ability to pay. We profess to follow that principle, but in practice we do not, except to a very limited extent. The income tax is the outstanding example of this kind of a tax. One of the questions which the proposed commission undoubtedly would consider would be the broadening of the income-tax base. This, of course, is a rather unpopular subject. However, I should expect the Commission, if it made a recommendation along this line, to offset the extension of the income tax to those in the lower-income groups by the elimination of the taxes paid by such groups which are not based on ability to pay. I realize that there are some few taxes of this character, such as those on liquor and tobacco, which from the revenue standpoint probably would have to be continued.

HIDDEN TAXES SHOULD BE ELIMINATED

Fifth, it is proposed that indirect and hidden taxes be eliminated insofar as possible. This principle overlaps the one just mentioned to some extent, but it needs separate recognition. These indirect taxes not only are not based on ability to pay, but their principal vice is that they deceive the taxpayer, particularly the person of small means, as to just how much he is having to pay for what the President has termed "the luxury of being governed." On November 18, 1937, I presented to the House some studies showing how much persons in various income groups paid per year in the form of hidden taxes. These studies showed that a man with an income of only $80 per month, who owned neither a home nor a car, paid over $116 annually to the Federal, State, and local governments in taxes of this kind, which, of course, he did not realize he was paying. The man with $150-a-month income who owned a second-hand car but no home paid $229 a year in hidden taxes. It was found that 25 cents out of every dollar paid to the landlord for rent went to reimburse him for taxes assessed against the property. The hidden tax in every dollar paid for food is 7 cents, for clothing 8 cents, for fuel and light 9½ cents, for transportation by automobile 20 cents, for recreation 10 cents, and so on. A large part of the price of everything a man buys is represented by hidden taxes of one kind or another.

According to official Treasury estimates, over 60 percent of the Federal tax collections come from taxes of this character. Because so many of our taxes are hidden, persons of small means, who are not subject to the income tax, are led to believe that they are paying nothing to the support of the Government, when as a matter of fact they are actually contributing the greater share of the total tax burden. If we would bring Federal taxes out into the open, so that each person would know how much he is contributing to the cost of government, we would soon get back to a sane spending program. Only when the people are tax conscious will they become expenditure conscious as well.

SIMPLIFICATION NEEDED

Sixth, it is proposed that efforts be made to simplify the Federal-tax system, including the forms of taxation, the statement of the law, and the methods of administration. Everyone knows that our present tax laws are a headache for taxpayers, and a bonanza for tax lawyers and accountants. There is room for much work to be done along the line of simplification. It has been said that we cannot have simple tax laws applying to the complexities of modern business methods, but still we do not have to go out of our way to make the statement of the law unintelligible, or the methods of taxation unnecessarily complicated.

SHOULD ALLEVIATE HARDSHIPS AND INEQUITIES

Seventh, it is proposed to alleviate the hardships and inequities in the application and administration of the tax laws. That these hardships and inequities exist, no one will deny. We should remedy them to the extent that it is possible to do so.

THE PROBLEM OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Eighth, it is proposed to minimize double taxation on the part of the Federal and State Governments. This is one of our most pressing problems, and one which is going to be most difficult of solution. It is worthy of being made the subject of a special study. The commission, however, could at least make recommendations as to how best to proceed in endeavoring to work the problem out.

TAX LOOPHOLES SHOULD BE CLOSED

Ninth, it is proposed that further efforts be made to prevent tax evasion and avoidance. Much work has already been done along this line, but some of the outstanding methods of tax avoidance still remain unremedied. One of these is the community property system which prevails in some nine States, whereby citizens in those States are legally enabled to reduce their Federal income tax by as much as 40 percent.

OTHER DESIRABLE CHANGES

Tenth, it is proposed that the commission suggest such other changes as will improve the Federal-tax system. This is more or less of a basket clause, there being no intention to limit the commission in the scope of its study. Under this heading, the commission could give consideration to such matters as whether it is desirable to recognize capital gains and losses for income-tax purposes, whether dividends should continue to be taxed at the normal rate in the hands of individuals, whether sufficient preference is now given to the treatment of earned, as distinguished from unearned income, and such other matters as might properly come up in connection with the general tax problem. Any number of matters of this kind could be mentioned.

FEDERAL TAX COMMISSION LONG ADVOCATED BY MANY GROUPS

Under the resolution, the commission would be directed to make such investigations as it deemed necessary or advisable in order to carry out the purposes set forth. It would be directed to report to Congress not later than January 3, 1942, which would give it ample time in which to make its study and formulate its recommendations.

Let me say that the setting up of a nonpartisan Federal tax commission on which various economic groups would be represented has long been advocated by many outstanding organizations and individuals. Among the national organizations favoring such a commission are the American Farm Bureau Federation, the American Federation of Labor, the American Bar Association, the American Institute of Accountants, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Thus agriculture, labor, and industry all unite in the demand for a study such as I provide for in my resolution.

The round table on taxation and recovery, conducted last year by Fortune magazine, which was participated in by leading businessmen and tax authorities, unanimously recommended the establishment of a national tax commission, saying in part:

Our first and foremost suggestion is that Congress authorize the appointment of a national tax commission, drawn from among the ablest men in public and private life, to take evidence from every competent source, and recommend the adoption of such principles and methods of administration as would remove much of the present complexity and uncertainty.

Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, one of the elder statesmen of the Democratic Party, said, in testifying before the Senate Committee on Unemployment and Relief in 1938:

Revision of Federal and State tax structures for maximum business activity and at the same time maximum revenue on the law of diminishing returns requires study. I am not here making specific recommendations except as to principles. But I believe that an open hearing in a deliberate inquiry by a mixed commission where economic as well as political tax experts could be heard, could make proposals much improving the present tax structure, and it is hard to excuse our delay in doing that. It is a matter of public concern and pretty near first magnitude. If there is such a thing as science in government, this is where it should be applied. The Treasury is no place for the theories of political messiahs.

One of the organizations which has taken a most prominent part in advocating the creation of a Federal tax commission is the American Institute of Accountants. Tax lawyers and accountants come in direct contact with the problems which taxpayers meet in the application of the law and its administration by the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the courts. The Committee on Federal Taxation of the American Institute of Accountants, in a report made a little over 2 years ago, stated:

For many years the determination of sound principles of Federal taxation has been urged. Treasury emergency and political expediency have combined to defer this objective. The administration could do not one thing of greater importance to assure the future stability of business than to bring about the creation of a qualified nonpartisan commission to conduct the research required for the unbiased determination of fixed principles of Federal income taxation. The most confusing and perilous factor confronting those who chart the course of business today is that of taxation. Much of the uncertainty could be removed.

Since that time this organization has continued to advocate such a commission, and in its most recent report, dated September 18, 1939, states in part:

Official recognition has already been given in this country to the proposal for a qualified nonpartisan tax commission, Representative TREADWAY having introduced in the last two sessions of Congress joint resolutions providing for the creation of such a commission. Although these resolutions failed of legislative consideration, they should be revived and aggressively championed. * * * The real solution of our national tax dilemma awaits the appointment of an unbiased national tax commission, comprising individuals drawn from business, labor, government, and professional circles, who have a well-grounded knowledge of tax matters.

PROPOSED COMMISSION WOULD HAVE BROAD REPRESENTATION

In my resolution I have proposed a commission of 10 members, which is about as small a number as can reasonably be provided for and still give broad representation. There would be 4 congressional members and 6 representing the public. I have provided for 2 congressional members from each branch, 1 representing the majority party and 1 the minority party, in keeping with the nonpartisan character of the commission. Of the 6 public members 1 would be representative of agriculture, 1 of labor, 1 of business and industry, 1 of individual taxpayers and consumers, 1 of tax lawyers and accountants, and 1 of tax economists. These members would be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. They would constitute a majority of the commission.

The chief criticism of past tax studies is that they have never been very thorough, and in no instance has the public had any representation. They have been conducted by the revenue committees of the Congress working in conjunction with the Treasury. Of course, those who write the tax laws are naturally somewhat prejudiced in favor of their own handiwork. There has been too little sympathy with the viewpoint and problems of those who have to pay the tax bill. Every organization which has endorsed the proposal for a Federal tax commission has called attention to this fact and urged that interests and viewpoints be represented.

Since the introduction of my resolution two other Members of the House have introduced similar measures, namely, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]. This is evidence of the increasing interest in the matter. This is strictly a nonpartisan proposition, and I do not see how there can be any objection to it.

PROPOSED STUDY ALREADY TOO LONG DELAYED

We have already waited too long to undertake a complete overhauling of the Federal tax structure, which, as nearly everyone concedes, is much to be desired. The creation of a Federal tax commission would enable us to establish a more sound, more equitable, more understandable, and more productive tax system, and obviate the necessity for frequent changes in the forms and incidence of taxation. With our revenue problem as grave as it now is, there is all the more reason why this study should be undertaken. Before imposing any new taxes, we ought to know exactly where we stand and where and how far we can go for new revenue without "killing the goose." [Applause.]

EXHIBIT B

COMMENTS OF SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY MORGENTHAU ON TREADWAY RESOLUTION

(Extracts from hearings before Ways and Means Committee on revenue bill of 1939)

Mr. TREADWAY. In view of the fact that you suggest the creation of a small commission, don't you think that there are serious questions involved in the whole tax picture that would deserve an investigation by a nonpartisan commission?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Well, Mr. TREADWAY, I made this suggestion in order to raise a question which I think is a very important one. And just how Congress, in its wisdom, will handle it, naturally I will leave to them. But ever since I have been in the Treasury I have felt that this question of overlapping taxes is one of the important ones, and I take the liberty of bringing this to the attention of Congress so that you really might do something about it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, the modesty of Mr. JENKINS leads me to exhibit a similar modesty, but I call your attention to a measure which I introduced in two Congresses. In the last Congress I introduced a resolution, and repeated it in the Seventy-sixth Congress, extending this Commission's study on a broader scale than what you are suggesting here. Therefore, I would like to ask that House Joint Resolution 35 of the Seventy-sixth Congress also be given the attention of your experts, wherein it is stated:

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress—

"(1) To establish a stable, more permanent Federal tax policy."

You would agree that that is desirable, would you not?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then, in the second place—

"To raise the necessary revenue for the support of the Government with the least possible burden on individual taxpayers and business enterprises."

I take it this very statement you are making to us this morning is along that very line, is it not?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. I think both aims are laudable.

Mr. TREADWAY. Thank you. Then—

"(3) To give due regard to the natural economic law of diminishing returns in fixing tax rates."

You would approve of that, would you not?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY (reading):

"(4) To base Federal taxes, insofar as may be practicable and expedient, upon the principle of ability to pay."

That is a good policy of the Government, is it not?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Excellent.

The CHAIRMAN. It sounds like the Democratic platform.

Mr. KNUTSON. It does sound like it, but Mr. TREADWAY wants to carry it into effect.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then—

"(5) To eliminate insofar as may be possible indirect and hidden taxes."

Is there anything worse in our whole tax program than hidden taxes?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. I think we can agree on that.

Mr. TREADWAY (reading):

"(6) To simplify the Federal tax system, including the forms of taxation, the statement of the law, and the methods of administration."

Those are all laudable purposes, are they not?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Very.

Mr. TREADWAY (reading):

"(7) To alleviate hardships and inequities in the application and administration of the internal-revenue laws."

That is a good doctrine?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY (reading):

"(8) To minimize double taxation by coordinating the Federal tax system with those of the State and local governments."

That is exactly what you are recommending, is it not, in this small board you recommend setting up?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Yes, sir.

Mr. TREADWAY. So that you approve of that?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Yes, sir.

Mr. TREADWAY (reading):

"(9) To prevent tax avoidance."

That is the objective of all of us?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. It is.

Mr. TREADWAY. And—

"(10) To make such other changes as will improve the Federal internal-revenue system."

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Fine.

Mr. TREADWAY. Those are the declarations of policy. Then this modest bill of mine, timidly offered for your comment at this time, goes on to set up a Commission composed of two members of the Senate Finance Committee, two members of the Ways and Means Committee, and six members, none of whom hold any office in the Government of the United States or are engaged in activities of any political party, to be chosen by the President.

Secretary MORGENTHAU. Very good.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is a good board, isn't it?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. It sounds very good to me.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then, so far as I can see—the rest of it is more or less detail, method of procedure, and so on—so far as I can gather from your responses to my inquiries, you and I are in hearty accord as to the desirability of setting up such a nonpartisan commission.

Secretary MORGENTHAU. If I again might answer, it seems that you and Mr. JENKINS, the President, and I are all in accord.

Mr. TREADWAY. It looks very like it, and I am very glad to have you come around to our way of thinking.

EXHIBIT C

[Editorial appearing in the Journal of Accountancy, July 1939]

TAX REFORM

The American Institute of Accountants committee on Federal taxation has repeatedly stated its conviction that the first step toward placing the Federal tax system on a sound and equitable basis should be the creation of a qualified nonpartisan commission to establish fixed principles of income taxation and related administrative procedure. Shortly before adjournment of the Seventy-fifth Congress Representative TREADWAY, of Massachusetts, introduced a resolution which embodied the substance of the institute committee's proposal. In doing so Mr. TREADWAY quoted the committee's recommendations on the floor of the House of Representatives. Since no action was taken at that session of the Congress, the resolution was still pending when the 1939 session convened. Until recently there seemed little likelihood that it would receive serious consideration. On May 27, however, the prospect changed. The Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Ways and Means Committee of the House on that day to discuss tax revision. He recommended that a temporary national committee be established to study all forms of taxation and to recommend improvements in the tax structure as a whole. Congressman TREADWAY, in colloquy with the Secretary, read the aims and purposes of the resolution and obtained from him an expression of complete agreement with each. Mr. Morgenthau further agreed to have the Treasury Department make a thorough study of the resolution and report to Congress on it.

Provisions of the resolution itself, which is known as House Joint Resolution 35, were described fully in the Journal of Accountancy for July 1938. We cannot imagine any basis for disagreement with the proposals advanced by Mr. TREADWAY, and we believe that this is an issue to which the accountancy profession will wish to summon its full support.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GIFFORD. Is not the gentleman fearful that the make-up of that commission would do more harm than good under the present administration, having in mind the T. N. E. C. appointments? In the end you might get a recommendation far different than the gentleman would expect. Is it not better to wait a little while?

Mr. TREADWAY. I have waited for 2 years to even have a hearing on this measure.

Mr. GIFFORD. Does the gentleman trust the President to appoint these members?

Mr. TREADWAY. The President of the United States ought to be—and I think I can say must be—interested in the welfare of his fellow citizens. I cannot conceive of a man competent to fill the office of President of the United States, to whatever party he may belong, endeavoring to set up a board having to do with the individual interests of every citizen of the country that would not treat those divisions that I spoke of fairly. I may have a little more regard for the present incumbent of the White House than the gentleman from Cape Cod.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am reading the hearings before the T. N. E. C., and many of those men—all those enthusiastic new dealers have been appointed 90 percent of the time, and 90 percent of the doctrine placed before them is of these New Deal schemes. I do not think the gentleman would be happy at all with any report that could come from a commission appointed at this time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, it is such an important subject that there should not be any undue delay in anticipation of a change of administration. I am not going to take up the question of partisanship in connection with this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the subject matter is too important to become involved in a discussion of the question of partisanship.

While I asked the Treasury Department on March 6 for a formal report on my resolution, none has been received up to this time. However, as I have pointed out, the Secretary has personally endorsed the proposal, so he is already on record.

I may say that I have requested the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to hold hearings on the measure, but no action has as yet been taken on my request. However, he has discussed the matter with me informally, and I hope and trust that a favorable decision will be reached. I realize that it is difficult for a Republican Member to secure consideration of a measure when the Democratic Party is in control, but in view of the fact that my proposal is strictly nonpartisan and is one in which every person in the country has a vital interest, it would seem that the Democratic majority on the Ways and Means Committee might properly join in the nonpartisan spirit and permit public hearings to be held on the resolution. Then if my colleague wants to change the formation of the Commission, there is no pride of authorship so far as I am concerned. I shall be only too glad to have the benefit of his advice in submitting to the Ways and Means Committee a formal measure. I would say further that the measure I am introducing, of course, is only something to have before the committee, as the expression goes, to shoot at.

Mr. GIFFORD. If the gentleman will yield further, I can only remark that the present President is the only President we have. We cannot avoid having him make those appointments. The gentleman could not possibly change his resolution to avoid that.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not so sure that we cannot have a satisfactory commission. While I realize that my colleague is rather steeped in good old-fashioned conservative Republicanism—and I do not think I need take a back seat from him on that score myself—nevertheless I am willing to show that much confidence at least in whoever may be President of the United States. My thought is we want this study made. The country cannot go along under a different tax bill year after year. We need some permanent basis on which to set up taxation. I feel very strongly, therefore, that some measure of this kind ought to be passed. The first point, of course, is to have a hearing on it.

I thank the Committee for its indulgence.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a copy of the resolution I have introduced, some excerpts from a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee in which Mr. Morgenthau testified, and an editorial from an accounting magazine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair reminds the gentleman from Massachusetts that he will have to obtain such permission in the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not think I shall have to obtain permission to insert the resolution, shall I?

The CHAIRMAN. Permission must be secured in the House for the insertion of extraneous matter.

Mr. TREADWAY. But, Mr. Chairman, I submit this resolution is not extraneous, for it is one that I am proposing.

Mr. Chairman, I submitted three different requests, none of which, in my opinion, relate to extraneous matter under the rule. One is the resolution itself that I have introduced. I could read that in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair advises the gentleman that the Chair is informed by the Parliamentarian that permission to insert the matter referred to by the gentleman should be obtained in the House.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I realize, in saying what I am about to say, that I may tread on a lot of toes.

Mr. Chairman, I have been here in the capital of the United States now for some 7 years and have been giving considerable thought to the policies and programs of the people in control of the city and the building up of this great civic center, and the working out of those policies. I was very much interested in watching in a recent news release on the screen the act of demolishing an apartment house here in Washington to make way for the new War Department Building. As I study the city of Washington the first thing I would say in describing the city is that it is built a good deal like an egg. An egg is dark in the middle and white around the edges. I think Washington fits that description, for in the very heart of the city, down Florida Avenue and southward of it west to Sixteenth Street, it is pretty dark in complexion. I am giving some thought to this condition.

In thinking of this matter of the location of the new War Department Building, I often wonder why the powers that be put it where they did. I am wondering why the great investment was made in locating the building to house the munitions branch of the War and Navy Department in a swamp where we must use sandbags to barricade any excessive rise in the Potomac River. I am wondering why we have a $50,000 fountain in the shadow of the Capitol yet flanked by some of the most miserable slums to be found anywhere. I am wondering why the beautiful street laid out by the man who designed this city, that great French engineer, Pierre Charles L'Enfant, with its beautiful squares and circles, why majestic Pennsylvania Avenue that runs from the Capitol to the Anacostia River, an avenue having four rows of beautiful trees its entire length, is in its present neglected condition. I am wondering why there is no more interest in Congress in the care and upkeep of what was designed to be one of the finest streets in the world, a street that was laid out so broad and wide in the "horse and buggy" days, broken with parked squares, the natural location for fine homes and apartments, why it is in its neglected condition right here in the shadow of the Capitol when we have spent so many millions of dollars in building the magnificent Supreme Court structure, the Congressional Library, and its magnificent addition, the beautiful office buildings of both branches of the Congress. Why should we have such deplorable conditions along this avenue and in what we call the southeast section of the city, on what is known as Capitol Hill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman know who is responsible for placing the War Department Building where it is, a site which necessitated the tearing down of several apartment buildings, one of which cost $2,000,000? The naval appropriation bill, as I understand it, will provide for the construction of a building for the Navy Department. They are going to tear down more fine buildings and it seems ridiculous to me to do that. I think the gentleman would do a good thing if he found out who is responsible for such a program.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I am wondering why that building is put down there in the swampy section of Washington when the development of the city is taken into consideration, when it is conceivable that some day it may be advisable to have subways around Washington to expedite the handling of Government business. How can you build a subway down in the swamps which are below the level of the Potomac River when we have such a beautiful addition up here on Capitol Hill?

I am told we have a Fine Arts Commission, a zoning commission, and a Park and Planning Commission in Washington. Go out into the northeast and southeast sections of the city and observe the results of their deliberations, their policies, and their plans.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I am wondering why we leave these old and antiquated buildings flanking the Supreme Court and flanking the House and Senate Office Buildings, when we are at the same time spending millions of dollars tearing down magnificent apartment buildings in a city in which the rents are so high. In passing I would like to congratulate this city on being one of the few cities of the United States that enjoys two Christmases. I have gone down town and I have seen the Easter holiday crowds. I have never seen in any western or eastern city the stores jammed with people buying useless novelties in the holiday season as I have seen here in Washington during this wonderful Easter holiday. It must be a wonderful thing to be a merchant and to be in business in the capital of the United States with all these high-priced, well-paid civil-service employees, that nobody responsible to the people in the legislative branch of the Government can do anything about their policies, their labor, or the kind of service they give as we find them here in the capital of the United States.

May I suggest to the Park and Planning Commission and the zoning commission and the Fine Arts Commission that it might be worth while to take into consideration that some day we may want a better means of transportation and access to the several departments in the city of Washington. We lose a great deal of time getting to these departments and back here. It is very costly to the Government and to the Members. I am wondering why we could not locate these buildings somewhere around the Capitol of the United States and run a subway, as we have between the House and Senate Office Buildings and the Capitol, and have a quick, inexpensive means of transportation and a compact arrangement where these buildings would be located conveniently to doing the business of the Government rather than having them in some other sections away from the Capitol to boom real estate prices. I am wondering what the Planning Commission and the zoning commission is doing about that?

You know in this day and age people demand conveniences. They are not interested in living in some three-story building where they do not have janitor service, a telephone exchange, or elevators. How in the world can a property owner give those accommodations under the rules and regulations of our wonderful zoning commission? The plans of this zoning commission and the restrictions it puts on the development of this city make for the dark section in the central part of Washington. People go out where they can have unrestricted building designs and building plans. They abandon this central section. There is no way to replace these old, obsolete buildings under the rules of the zoning commission. What do you find? You find that the Capitol of the United States is inhabited by a class that is not progressive, by a class that is destructive to the development of this city. If you go down to the Federal Housing Administration and talk to them about improvements, they say "There is an infiltration into that section of undesirable people; we are not making any loans and we are not making any developments there." On whose shoulders is that responsibility? According to my idea it is based on an erroneous idea of this Park and Planning Commission and this wonderful zoning commission which is retarding the development of our Capital City and building up outlying districts in Maryland and Virginia. [Applause.]

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RICH.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Idaho, who just preceded me [Mr. WHITE], seems greatly perturbed at some of the things that are happening in Washington by the New Deal administration. I am not surprised at anything that happens nowadays by this Congress, because I am expecting most anything. I have seen so much happen here in the last 10 years since I have been in Washington that most anything can happen and it would not surprise me at all—some good, but more bad than good, I must admit. If the worst comes to the worst, we have an administration that is responsible. Promises versus performances. The promises were not carried out. Why?

First, let me call the attention of these people, Members of Congress who are surprised, to the Democratic platform of 1932. Among other things it stated:

> We favor maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate Executive estimates with revenues raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

That is a good plank for any platform.

Now, let me call attention to the deficits of this administration since 1934. In 1934 the deficit was $3,255,393,297; in 1935, $3,782,966,360; in 1936, $4,952,928,957; in 1937, $3,252,539,719; in 1938, $1,449,625,881; and last year $3,600,514,404. This year it will approach close to $4,000,000,000. Some deficits!

What does this mean? I hold in my hand a Treasury statement of March 26. Since last July we have gone into the red to the extent of $2,667,639,483.12, notwithstanding the fact that our internal-revenue collections this year were 30 percent above those of last year.

They have all been applied to this deficit up to this time. That means that in 270 days you have been going in the red at the rate of $9,880,150 a day. It means that every hour of the day you are going in the red $411,700, and for every minute of the day you are going in the red $6,861, after the promises this administration made when they were seeking election by the American people—8 long years on the road to bankruptcy; 8 long years of terrible deficits.

But that is not all. I could recite to you many, many times just what the President of the United States said when he was seeking election and what he said after he came into office asking for economy in government. Let me call your attention to the fact that on March 10, 1933, the President presented a message to the House of Representatives and the Senate in which he said:

> The Nation is deeply gratified by the immediate response given yesterday by the Congress to the necessity for drastic action to restore and improve our banking system. A like necessity exists with respect to the finances of the Government itself which requires equally courageous, frank, and prompt action.

For 3 long years the Federal Government has been on the road toward bankruptcy.

For the fiscal year 1931 the deficit was $462,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1932 it was $2,472,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1933 it will probably exceed $1,200,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1934, based on the appropriation bills passed by the last Congress and the estimated revenues, the deficit will probably exceed $1,000,000,000 unless immediate action is taken.

Thus we shall have piled up an accumulated deficit of $5,000,000,000.

He was speaking about the former administration, and when we remember that his administration is in its eighth year and has piled up a deficit of over $25,000,000,000, I wonder what he thinks about it. Mr. Hoover was only one-fifth as extravagant as Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield now. I will yield when I finish this statement.

Let me quote further from this message of President Roosevelt:

With the utmost seriousness, I point out to the Congress the profound effect of this fact upon our national economy. It has contributed to the recent collapse of our banking structure. It has accentuated the stagnation of the economic life of our people. It has added to the ranks of the unemployed. Our Government's house is not in order, and for many reasons no effective action has been taken to restore it to order.

Upon the unimpaired credit of the United States Government rest the safety of deposits, the security of insurance policies, the activity of industrial enterprises, the value of our agricultural products, and the availability of employment. The credit of the United States Government definitely affects these fundamental human values. It therefore becomes our first concern to make secure the foundation. National recovery depends upon it.

Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on rocks of loose fiscal policy. We must avoid this danger.

It is too late for a leisurely approach to this problem. We must not wait to act several months hence. The emergency is accentuated by the necessity of meeting great refunding operations this spring.

We must move with a direct and resolute purpose now. The Members of Congress and I are pledged to immediate economy.

I am therefore assuming that you and I are in complete agreement as to the urgent necessity, and my constitutional duty is to advise you as to the methods for obtaining drastic retrenchment at this time.

I am not speaking to you in general terms. I am pointing out a definite road.

That is the statement the President made in his message to the Congress on March 10, 1933, and ever since that time he has been doing exactly what he promised the people of this country he would not do, before he was elected and after he was elected. He sure did get off the road.

The gentleman who just preceded me seemed to be very much agitated about what is happening in the Capital. I am very much agitated about what Congress has done and what the Congress is going to do. Ever since January we have seen newspaper headlines to the effect that the Congress of the United States was going to economize. We have seen the Senate of the United States pass a resolution asking that a joint committee of the House and the Senate be established to try to get together to work out things on a good, sound business basis. The Senate passed the resolution but the House has taken no action whatever on it. What is the result? They are just going hog wild, in appropriations and expenditures; they are just running in the red, as I stated awhile ago, at the rate of almost $8,000 a minute, and no head of this Government is trying to do anything to stop it. Neither the Speaker of the House nor the majority leader or any of the chairmen of the various committees have got together to try to work out a plan whereby they could make revenues equal outgo. They are piling up this deficit on the heads of the children of oncoming generations. If we cannot meet the situation in this day, how are our children going to be able to meet the situation? If you have a boy or a girl in your house, you know what they are confronted with. It is either bankruptcy or ruin, unless we change the conditions as they are at the present time.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. The gentleman ought to be fair to the President. The President wanted to abolish this debt—he said he did. I think he is abolishing it, do not you? You know, this thing we once called debt the New Deal has transformed into a credit.

Mr. RICH. They have taken jack rabbits out of the hat ever since they have been in office, and the people of this country should realize it by this time. If they ever put Mr. Roosevelt back in office again we will lose our form of Government, because he does not know how to run it. For 7 years he has been trying. Nine million men were unemployed when he came into office and now, in the eighth year of his administration, 9,000,000 men are unemployed, and the Government is going further into the red and the situation is getting worse every minute of the day. Why does he not do as he promised he would do.

Let me read to you what the President of the United States said before his election. You see if this is not a sound statement, and then see what a back flipper he has turned out to be.

We are not getting an adequate return for the money we are spending in Washington; or, to put it another way, we are spending altogether too much money for Government services that are neither practical nor necessary. And then, in addition to that, we are attempting too many functions. We need to simplify what the Federal Government is giving to the people.

I accuse the present administration—

He was speaking then about the former administration—of being the greatest spending administration in peacetimes in all our history. It is an administration that has piled bureau on bureau, commission on commission, and has failed to anticipate the dire needs and the reduced earning power of the people. Bureaus and bureaucrats, commissions and commissioners have been retained at the expense of the taxpayer.

He said this in his speech at Sioux City, Iowa, on September 29, 1932.

Now, let me show you what that gentleman in the White House has done since he has been in office, and this is a terrible situation. He has set up 31 major functions of government, and he has no less than 1,476 subsidiary organizations and corporations administered by these 31 great functions of Government; and what has been the result?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield? Let me tell the gentleman what he promised.

Mr. RICH. We all know what he promised; but can you show me where he carried out his promises?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Did you read this one:

It is my pledge and promise that this dangerous kind of financing shall be stopped and that rigid governmental economy shall be fostered by a stern and unremitting administration policy of living within our income.

Do you remember that one?

Mr. RICH. Well, he has always been long on promises but short on performance. Just let me give you one illustration. Since George Washington took office up to the present administration, which includes all the five wars and the great World War, our receipts were $91,586,076,130. Since Mr. Roosevelt took office, less than 8 years ago, he received $40,089,857,957. He received 43 percent of all the moneys that were received since the beginning of this Government. Now, what did he do in the way of expenditures?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield until I give you this information, and you ought to know what this is, too. [Laughter.]

Since George Washington and up to the time Mr. Roosevelt took office, the country spent $112,203,367,065. Since Mr. Roosevelt took office on March 4, 1933, or less than 8 years ago, he has spent $65,628,526,692, which is 58 percent of all the money we have received from the time of George Washington up to the present day. Think of it! All the debts, including all the five wars, amounted to $20,617,290,935 when he took office. Since he has been in office he has spent $25,538,668,735 more than we received and put us in the red to that extent. This means that the national debt, which was $22,538,672,164 when he came into office, is now over $44,938,577,622, about 100-percent increase, and that includes all the assets that he has figured 100 cents on the dollar in the great number of corporations we have established in this country during his administration; and what will be the result when we go to liquidate those corporations that he has established? You know and I know we have many corporations with assets figured 100 cents on the dollar, and we will take a dreadful loss when they are liquidated.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield now.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I appreciate the gentleman's sincere desire for economy. The gentleman in his speech a moment ago mentioned the creation, I believe, under the Roosevelt administration of some 32 new departments of government. I am wondering if the gentleman will inform the House, in his own service during the Roosevelt administration, just how many of these agencies the gentleman voted against creating.

Mr. RICH. I voted against pretty nearly everything that this administration brought up except the Economy Act, and I was very badly fooled on that, because I thought that the President of the United States, when he brought in the Economy Act, was going to do what he said he would do; but he fooled and humbugged the people until in March 1934, when he asked for $4,880,000,000 in House Joint Resolution 117, and section 6 of that resolution read something like this: Anyone criticizing the administration or the handling of this fund will be fined $5,000 or imprisoned for 2 years. I made up my mind then that the President of the United States wanted to be a dictator or he would never have had that language put in a bill, and I left him then and have had little confidence in him since. I believe in honesty and thrift.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield just for a question.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I would like to discuss——

Mr. RICH. No; you cannot discuss; make it a question.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I find myself more in accord with the gentleman on his criticism of the spending program——

Mr. RICH. I thank the gentleman very much. I cannot yield any further. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield further. Lots of Democrats tell me that they are in accord with me in economy, but when it comes to voting they always do the opposite; they vote money out of an empty Treasury.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I want to develop the position of the gentleman on spending. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RICH. I cannot yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, let me call attention to what has been doing this session of Congress. Notwithstanding the fact that the House said they were going to be for economy, and the Senate said that they were going to be for economy, and this is a New Deal House and a New Deal Senate, yet Congress has appropriated to date as follows:

Agriculture (passed the Senate)	[1] $922,911,213.00
District of Columbia (reported to the House)	48,291,717.00
Independent offices (passed the Senate)	1,139,783,528.00
Interior (passed the House)	118,578,187.05
Labor–Federal Security (passed the House)	1,021,639,700.00
Legislative (passed the House)	23,907,744.00
Navy (passed the House)	965,779,438.00
State, Justice, and Commerce (passed the Senate)	107,079,000.00
Treasury and Post Office (law)	1,032,801,095.00
War Department, civil (passed the House)	203,472,567.00
Emergency, supplemental (law)	252,340,776.00
Urgent deficiency (law)	57,541,300.00
First deficiency (passed the Senate)	91,533,408.52
A grand total of	5,985,659,673.57

[1] In addition, $90,000,000 made available from R. F. C. funds.

You have spent $5,985,659,673.57 to date. Let me call your attention to the total receipts of last year, 1939, $5,667,823,625. That means that you have already appropriated more than $300,000,000—more than you took in in 1939 in taxes. The estimated receipts of the President for 1940 are $5,703,795,000. There are other appropriation bills to come before the House. There will be the relief bill, and what is going to be the result next year? You promised faithfully and every one of you fellows that went in on the platform in 1932 told the people of this country that you were going to have a balanced Budget. I realize that you cannot balance the Budget at once, but you are not making any honest effort to do anything. That is what burns me up. You are not making an honest effort to cut down expenses. You could do a whole lot if you wanted to do it or desired to do it. And it is a shame that you do not. You ought to try to get a business organization here for Government operation. The great difficulty is that there is no leadership, there is no organization, because, if there was, you would not do what you have done here this week in spending. All we seem to do is appropriate money. We had a bill up here on Monday of this week to bring taxes in for the District of Columbia. When we had this present District of Columbia appropriation bill under consideration in the Appropriations Committee the other day I asked the chairman of the subcommittee whether he tried in any manner to cooperate with the District Committee, to find out just what taxes would be necessary in order that they might balance the budget for the District of Columbia.

To my surprise he said they did not need any additional taxes in the District of Columbia. I then asked whether that was the reason why they voted against the tax bill last week. I asked that in good faith, and I thought to myself that I had better talk to the mayor of the city and get his reaction to the tax bill and why it was brought in here if it was not needed. So I went to the mayor of the city, Mr. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, a mighty fine fellow, and I said to him, "Mr. Mayor, what did you bring this tax bill in for? The Appropriations Committee says that you do not need any money or any additional taxes." He stated the tax experts of the District said it was necessary. Whom am I to believe? Why did not the Appropriations Subcommittee and the District Committee get together? That is the point I want to make. Why does not the Speaker of the House call the majority leader and the chairmen of the various committees into conference, to get together on good orderly business procedure, and try to find out what our income is and what the outgo will be, and what deficit we are going to pile up on the children of the oncoming generations? What are we going to do to protect this Nation? What are we going to do to save America?

Mr. President, why not carry out your promises of economy? Why not cut out unnecessary functions of Government as you promised? Why not have economy in Government as you promised? For the sake of our children and our country, if you do not soon get away from this program of ruthless spending, we will go bankrupt and we will lose our form of government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK].

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, you will recall the Pelley-Dies letter affair in which David D. Mayne, under oath before the Dies committee and before the Rules Committee, admitted the crime of forgery. He also admitted perjury and selling these letters for money to fool certain persons and in order, in his own words, to "put them out on a limb." Gardner Jackson and Harold Misberg, under sworn complaint before the United States district attorney, charged Mayne with perjury, forgery, obtaining money under false pretenses, and conspiring with unknown persons to violate a Federal statute. A grand jury was empaneled and listened to testimony concerning this affair. The investigation was conducted by David A. Pine, United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, assisted by Mr. Wilson, assistant district attorney. That jury, after deliberation and after hearing the assistant district attorney, has reported and failed to indict this self-confessed perjurer and forger, even though I am further informed that David Mayne refused to testify before the grand jury, giving as his reason that his testimony might incriminate him. I thought it might be interesting for you to know now that it is not considered a crime in the District of Columbia to commit forgery or perjury.

The grand jury, not having brought out an indictment of forgery against David D. Mayne who, under oath before the Dies committee and the Rules Committee, testified he forged the letters, any reasonable person must come to the conclusion that they must have based their decision on the fact that the letters were not forged but genuine. If the letters are genuine, according to the action of the grand jury, then, of course, they should be replaced in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD because they were taken out after David D. Mayne testified that he forged them.

Is this action on the part of the United States District Attorney David A. Pine, and his assistant, Mr. Wilson, to be construed to mean that the so-called Pelley letters were not forged?

I know that the people of this Nation are still in a quandary about the Pelley-Mayne affair before the Dies committee. Pelley, whose aims are admittedly the same as the Dies committee, is still at large. David Mayne, who was employed by the Dies committee, the perpetrator of these crimes, is now free. I wonder why? You can use your own imagination as to what must have happened, because David D. Mayne is reported to have boasted of protection by the Dies committee and its investigators. William Dudley Pelley, in his publication, Liberation, several weeks ago, carried the story that Mayne was entitled to protection from the Dies committee. Probably a resolution for a special committee to investigate this whole affair would be in order.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I did not get the drift of it. What is the complaint? Is it that Mayne is not being prosecuted?

Mr. HOOK. Yes; that is right.

Mr. HOFFMAN. What crime did he commit?

Mr. HOOK. Was not the gentleman before the Rules Committee, and did he not hear the evidence?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I understand that Mayne——

Mr. HOOK. Forged letters.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. HOOK. Perjured himself and obtained money under false pretenses.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Well, just a moment. I do not know anything about obtaining money under false pretenses, but I am getting at this matter of perjury and forgery. There cannot be forgery unless it is in connection with some judicial proceeding. I do not hold any brief for Mayne, but what is the specific crime what you want Mayne indicted for?

Mr. HOOK. I mentioned all of them. The testimony has gone before the grand jury.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am not critical, now, as the gentleman may think.

Mr. HOOK. That is up to the grand jury.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I do.

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the gentleman could tell us why the various district attorneys have not prosecuted the 22 indictments for income-tax frauds in Louisiana and why they have not prosecuted the indictments against Smith and Shushan for selling W. P. A. jobs, which were handed down last summer in New York City?

Mr. HOOK. If I were United States District Attorney, I could answer the gentleman, but I am not, and I am not a mind reader nor a crystal gazer.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I want to state that personally I appreciate the painstaking labor which has been given to the District of Columbia appropriation bills by Members charged with that responsibility. The gentleman from Florida, Chairman CALDWELL, has done a good job, and I commend him and his fellow subcommittee members. Theirs is not an easy task. Of course, they are only face to face with District problems once a year, whereas those of us who serve on the legislative committee for the District of Columbia in this House are face to face with those problems practically every day, and at least every week, during the sessions of Congress.

I feel that there is an obligation on my shoulders this afternoon to briefly discuss the need in the District of Columbia for giving bona fide residents in the United States Capital City the right and responsibility of franchise. I am well aware that there is a difference of opinion on this subject, and I know the arguments which are raised about suffrage for voteless citizens who live in this jurisdiction. I have weighed all of the arguments for and against, that I am able to study and inquire into, and my opinion on this matter is strengthened each year that I serve in Washington. I believe these are at least three local newspapers—the Star, the Post, and the Times-Herald, who editorially are fighting for the vote here. I feel more and more inclined to energetically, on every opportunity, speak in behalf of suffrage for the District of Columbia. I think it is significant that the distinguished and able chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary, Judge SUMNERS, of Texas, a man who has had long and faithful service in this body, after studying this question, has seen fit, in the last few months, to introduce a resolution which would call for national representation for the District of Columbia. I am told that there was a time when Judge SUMNERS, of Texas, did not believe there was need for suffrage here, but I know that the very introduction of the resolution by that legislator has come about through a growing conviction that he believe the cause is just. I regret that I, myself, and others have not been able, through legislative means, to bring this matter to the floor of Congress for debate, discussion, and vote.

I feel keenly that the 250,000 men and women who reside in Washington and can claim no bona fide residence in any State do not possess the responsibility and the inherent right to exercise their vote for President of the United States and for representation in both Houses of the Congress, and also for some form of local government.

I regret there are not more Members present while we are considering the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and, without criticism of any Member, I only wish the debate itself might center more fully around District matters. I say to those who are on the floor this afternoon that I cannot believe we can longer continue in this country to deny bona fide residents the privilege of voting in Washington, D. C. I do not feel that there is a section of America where the processes of democracy should not be fully at work. I hope Members of Congress will give more thought to the subject matter of my remarks.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I cannot help but rise here this afternoon and make a statement of commendation of the District of Columbia Legislative Committee and the District of Columbia Subcommittee on Appropriations. As the gentleman from West Virginia knows, the gentleman from Idaho made a pessimistic review of conditions in the District of Columbia a few moments ago. It seems to me—and I believe the gentleman from West Virginia will agree with me, a gentleman who is referred to from time to time as the mayor of the District—that Congress gets out of the District of Columbia just what it puts into it. We do not put a great deal into it. This is evidenced by the fact that this afternoon there are but a baker's half-dozen on the floor when the District bill is under consideration. It is no easy job to serve on these District committees. It is common knowledge in the House that when a new Member comes here he tries to shy away from the District Committee because it does not get a Member any votes back home, one must do much additional work, and frequently take a lot of abuse. I believe the legislative committee and the Appropriations Subcommittee on the District of Columbia deserve the gratitude and thanks of this Congress and the people of the District; but, as I say, Congress gets out of this District just what we put into it. If Congress would pay more attention to the District, such conditions as those complained of would not arise.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. HOOK. The gentleman has made a great study of the question of suffrage for the District of Columbia. Would he inform us whether or not the District of Columbia ever had the right of suffrage, and whether they asked that Congress take it back, and why?

Mr. RANDOLPH. There was a limited suffrage here, but I do not have time to go into that lengthy question.

The present feeling of the residents of the District of Columbia is clearly indicated by the results of a referendum they themselves conducted here on April 30, 1938. They voted before and after working hours. They spent their own money in that election and had no help from any Government agency. Practically 95,000 persons voted—all bona fide residents—and they were in favor of national representation by 9 to 1 and local suffrage by 7 to 1. They went voluntarily to the polls. There were no candidates to transport them there. They went and expressed their opinions on a vital subject. It was one of the most outstanding expressions of genuine public opinion that this Nation has ever seen.

I venture the assertion this afternoon that the time will come when suffrage in local government and national affairs will be granted the residents of the District of Columbia, as it is in the other parts of the Nation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, I arise at this time to say a few words to the Members of this House on what to me is one of the most important problems that has been before this House during this session and is now up for discussion and a vote in the Senate either today or not later than Monday.

There are several questions that I would like to have those handling the treaties answer before this power is extended to the President and the Secretary of State to continue to renew these treaties or make new ones.

First of all I would like to know why, after the tariff on cheese had been reduced 2 cents a pound under the first treaty with Canada had been entered into and the dairy farmer had been having a hard time to meet his obligations at that time, another reduction of 1 cent a pound was made in 1938, or a 20 percent reduction when cheese had been selling all that year at an average of 12.6 cents per pound?

Every dairyman knows that cheese at 12.6 cents per pound represents only about two-thirds of the cost of production. The Agriculture Department should have known this and if they did not know, then they should either get someone in the department that does know or discontinue the department having to do with dairy products. We have been paying enough money to the Department that they ought to know. Personally I would like to know who in the Department of Agriculture recommended this reduction of almost 50 percent in the tariff on cheese.

The dairy interests of this country are entitled to consideration the same as those producing other agricultural products, and if they do not get it there is going to be trouble in this country and it is not going to be confined to the dairy interests alone.

If anybody had taken the time to figure the cost of production of cheese and butter, they would have known that the reduction of the tariff on cheese would kill the industry in time.

In order to do this, I want to give you some figures on our investment in dairy cattle, the amount of dairy products we produce and some values of these products. I would like then to give you some facts and figures on imports and exports of dairy and other products which, either directly or indirectly, affect our daily life.

On January 1, 1939, we had 2,179,000 head of dairy cattle on farms in Wisconsin; Minnesota ranked next with 1,705,000, and Iowa third with 1,472,000 head; Texas fourth with 1,458,000 and New York fifth with 1,423,000 head.

The total milk production for Wisconsin alone in 1938 was 11,862,000,000 pounds and approximately 12,000,000,000 pounds in 1939. This figure for 1938 is about 484,000,000 pounds greater than the State's output in 1937. The average value of dairy cows in Wisconsin on January 1, 1939, was $69 per head, or a total value of $150,351,000. The average value per head on January 1, 1938, was $72. The total value of all dairy cattle in the United States on January 1, 1939, was $1,397,280,000.

The price of fluid milk during each month of the year 1938 was lower than for the year 1937, and the average loss to the Wisconsin farmers was about $1,000,000 each month.

In addition to the cheese we produced in the United States in 1937, we imported into this country about 60,000,000 pounds. Under reciprocal trade agreements this meant a loss to the Wisconsin farmers of about $1,000,000. The price paid to the farmers for livestock in 1938 averaged 12 percent lower than in 1937.

In 1935 the agricultural population of all the United States was placed at 31,800,907. This is about 25 percent of our total population.

The population of the 5 leading dairy States I have named is approximately 6,000,000 people. I figure the farmers raising cotton, corn, and wheat represent about 3.1 percent of our national income and have received millions in subsidies during the last few years. The dairy farmer has received nothing in subsidies.

We were able during the last session of Congress to get one hundred and twenty-five millions to buy surplus commodities, but this was given so the corn, cotton, and wheat growers might get larger amounts in subsidies as well as a substantial portion of the one hundred and twenty-five millions.

The Secretary of Agriculture pleaded with Congress for the one hundred and twenty-five millions to keep farm prices from going lower than in 1932.

The butterfat prices on my own farms between 1922 and 1932 averaged 46 cents per pound. They reached a low of 28 cents per pound in August 1938. I delivered all my milk to cheese factories.

Wisconsin farmers also received agricultural-relief payments made for crop reduction, rental and benefit checks, and payments for conservation of soil resources from 1933 to 1937, $24,479,202.29. This amount was paid to 18,416 farm families, numbering 78,382 people.

However, with all this help, Federal farm foreclosures in Wisconsin were three times as many in 1938 as in 1936—2 years earlier. The Federal land bank and land bank Commissioner foreclosed 1723 farm mortgages in Wisconsin in 1938, compared with 542 in 1936.

Foreclosures were particularly heavy in northern counties. I shall only call your attention to some counties in my own district, which may be considered the average in the State. Marinette had 5 foreclosures in 1936 and 39 in 1938; Oconto County, 6 in 1936 and 38 in 1938.

In some of the counties in my district where 15 years ago a foreclosure was seldom heard of, we find in 1938 foreclosures in both farm and city; 74 foreclosures in Brown County, Outagamie 88, Manitowoc 116, Oconto 71, Marinette 70, Kewaunee 21, and Door 39.

Now, let us take up and discuss the subject of reciprocal treaties and see if there is any possible casual connection between them and some of the conditions prevailing in the great dairy State of Wisconsin.

First of all I would like to call your attention to the fact that the treaty-making power under the Constitution of the United States rests with the President of the United States and the United States Senate. Subsection (1) of section (2) of article 2 of the United States Constitution provides:

He (the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

However, in 1934, this power given to the President and the Senate of the United States under the Constitution, was delegated by Congress to the President and Secretary of State, to enter into trade treaties with foreign nations.

Grave doubt exists whether Congress had the right or power to do this, but it has never been tested out in the courts.

This power expires on June 12, 1940, and the question arises, Should it be extended? This will depend upon what the American people think at this time. We have entered into some 24 treaties.

Now, let us see what has happened as a result of these treaties.

Dairymen know that the price of cattle is affected, the price of hogs also; and cream, butter, cheese, and all byproducts of milk.

In order to get a more complete history of our subject, we must go back to 1920–21, when there was a change of administration and Congress passed a farmers' emergency tariff to stop the importation of foreign products which were displacing American products and depressing all prices.

Under this act exports grew from $3,832,000,000 in 1922 to $5,241,000,000 in 1929, and our imports from $3,113,000,000 in 1922 to $4,339,000,000 in 1939.

In 1933 the present administration came into power, and in 1934 the treaty-making power was transferred as heretofore stated.

Treaties were entered into with Canada and some 23 other countries. I shall not go back to quote you figures, but it will be sufficient to give you some recent figures.

Take the item of cattle. In 1934 we exported 9,968 and imported 59,000 head. In 1935 we exported 3,348 and imported 365,000 head. In 1936 we exported 4,240 and imported 309,000. In 1937 we exported 4,132 and imported 494,945. For the first 9 months of 1938 we imported 295,000 head, and for the year 1939 we exported 2,918 and imported 753,570 head.

Now let us turn to live hogs—they go well with dairying. In 1924 we exported 3,052 head and imported 8,000 pounds of live hogs. If they weighed on an average of 200 pounds to a hog, it would be 400 head.

In 1935 we exported 303 head, but we imported 3,414,000 pounds, or at an average of 200 pounds to a hog, over 17,000 head.

In 1936 we exported 202 head and imported 17,446,000 pounds, or at 200 pounds per head, 87,230 head.

We have heard much about canned meats. In 1934 we exported 16,362,000 pounds and imported 46,781,000 pounds. In 1935 we exported 12,564,000 pounds and imported 76,653,000 pounds. In 1936 we exported 13,348,000 pounds and imported 87,959,000 pounds. In 1937 we exported 13,752,000 and imported 88,087,000, and for the first 8 months of 1939 we exported 83,404,580 pounds and imported 93,228,235 pounds.

Now, let us take up a more interesting article—butter. In 1934 we exported 1,253,000 pounds and imported 1,220,000 pounds. In 1935 we exported 958,000 pounds and imported 22,675,000 pounds. In 1936 we exported 826,000 pounds and imported 9,874,000 pounds. In 1937 we exported 800,000 pounds and imported 11,111,000 pounds, and for the first 8 months of 1939 we exported 1,285,344 and imported 702,500 pounds of butter.

I have saved the most interesting item for the last—cheese. In 1934 we exported 1,377,000 pounds and imported 47,533,000 pounds. In 1935 we exported 1,152,000 pounds and imported 48,923,000 pounds. In 1936 we exported 1,136,000 pounds and imported 59,849,000 pounds. In 1937 we exported 1,156,000 pounds and imported 60,650,000 pounds. For the year 1939 we exported 1,479,689 pounds and imported 59,071,059 pounds.

One item you will be interested in, that of corn. In 1934 we exported 2,987,000 bushels and imported 2,959,000 bushels. In 1935 we exported 177,000 bushels and imported 43,242 bushels. In 1936 we exported 524,000 bushels and imported 31,471,000 bushels. In 1937 we exported 5,834,000 bushels and imported 86,337,000 bushels.

Hay: In 1934 we exported 2,185 tons and imported 23,259; in 1935 we exported 2,718 tons and imported 67,171; in 1936 we exported 2,161 tons and imported 73,976; in 1937 we exported 41,400 tons and imported 146,149.

The farmers and dairymen are interested in their surplus barley, and barley malt, of course, is made from good Wisconsin barley. I find that we exported 25,968,000 pounds of barley malt during the year 1939 and imported 101,130,100 pounds.

Another item that goes into feed of the dairy farmer is that of oats, and I find that we exported 226,142 bushels for the year 1939 and imported 4,293,009 bushels.

I know that you will bear with me for a few minutes if I discuss an item which truly may not be classed as a dairy product but which affects the products of the dairy farmer materially, and that is the fur industry in Wisconsin and throughout the United States. If our fur producers in Wisconsin are prosperous, there is a good deal of money to be spent for dairy products, and if they are bankrupt they can buy just that much less. I find upon investigation, including the silver and black fox, which are very predominant in this State, and also the red fox, and all other kinds, that we exported from this country 43,804 during the first 9 months of 1939, and we imported 556,859. During the same period we exported 148,973 mink skins, and we imported 739,251. These were all undressed furs. Now, the dressed and dyed fox, both silver and black, for the same period, we exported 817 and imported 54,712.

We produce in Wisconsin very high-class furs, while a large majority of furs imported from foreign countries are of a cheaper type. I could go into a number of other articles affecting the dairy farmer, but I feel that I have given you sufficient facts and figures to give you some idea of whether we really are benefited by reciprocal treaties or not. Of course, the sole purpose of entering into these trade treaties was to assure us that our exports would increase decidedly with the countries with which we made the reciprocal treaties over those with which we did not have any treaties. Facts and figures do not bear out these promises, because for the first 9 months of 1939, compared with the first 9 months of 1938, a great increase in agricultural imports into the United States and a great decrease of agricultural exports from the United States has taken place. In the first 9 months of 1939 we imported farm products for consumption in the amount of $794,700,000, while in the same period in 1938 we purchased farm products in the amount of $711,600,000. For the same periods our agricultural exports declined from $602,700,000 in 1938 to $418,400,000 in 1939.

You can take the item of corn alone. During the first half of 1938, $30,000,000 of corn was exported to Canada, but less than $1,000,000 worth was exported in the same period in 1939.

I want to take just a little of your time to cite a few instances comparing the average exports in 1934 and 1935 with 1937 and 1938 to show whether we have been benefited by these trade treaties or not, and to do this I am going to call your attention to countries with whom we have trade agreements and those with whom we do not have any. Let us first turn to Latin America. For instance, in the case of Colombia and Guatemala the exports increased 84 and 18 percent, respectively. These are both treaty countries. However, our exports to Venezuela, a nontreaty country, increased by 161 percent. On November 7, 1939, we signed a trade agreement with Venezuela. Of course, the State Department does not give this information in their releases on the trade treaties.

Now, let us take two other countries, similarly situated—Brazil and Argentina. We have a treaty with the former but did not have any with the latter until November 6 of last year. Our exports to Brazil, the treaty country, increased 56 percent, but exports to Argentina, a nontreaty country, increased 97 percent.

We will now turn to Europe and see what kind of a comparison we find there. We have a trade treaty with Sweden but not with Norway; yet our exports to Norway increased in almost the same percentage as in the case of Sweden, 80 percent as against 81 percent. Thus, all we got out of the treaty with Sweden, after making numerous concessions to her in the American market at the expense of our own producers, was a 1-percent greater increase in exports than to Norway.

The great conservation program of the Government, which I have always been interested in, but rather doubtful as to any benefits to be gained from it, we have taken out of production 40,000,000 acres of land, and have been paying the farmers for not producing on it, is offset by placing into use some 67,000,000 acres through irrigation and other means of placing land into production.

You may be interested in knowing just how this distribution has been made, and who is getting the money, and the expense connected with the program, which most dairy farmers have participated in. I would not give this to you but it enters into the reciprocal treaty set-up, because it takes out of use land in this country that we could produce the farm products on that are imported into the United States.

During the years 1937 and 1938 there were approximately 6,000,000 farmers in this country participating; 3,657,000 of these farmers and landowners received benefits under the soil-conservation program. About $315,500,000 was actually spent in payments to the farmers for soil conservation, and $43,500,000 for administration expense.

If the $315,500,000 were evenly distributed to those who complied with the soil-conservation plan the average payment would be approximately $100.

But here are some figures to which I want to direct your particular attention. Out of 3,657,000 farmers 1,091,540, or almost one-third of them, received less than $20 each. There were 773,000 who received between $20 and $40 each; 500,000 who received between $40 and $60 each; and 556,000 who got between $60 and $100.

If the one-third of all farmers who received less than $20 annually, averaged as much as $15 each, and that is a liberal estimate, $15,000,000 would pay their bill.

If the 774,000 farmers who received between $20 and $40 each, received an average of $30, $22,000,000 would have paid their contracts.

Then, as to the 500,000 farmers who got less than $60, if they received an average of $50 each, $25,000,000 would pay them.

Then we have 556,000 farmers who received between $60 and $100. If their average payment was $80, and this is liberal, they would have received $44,480,000.

In other words, with $107,000,000 we paid approximately 3,000,000 farmers. Or, putting it another way, 80 percent of all the farmers received less than one-half of the funds allocated to the farmers and farm operators. Just think of it, only a comparatively few of the 3,000,000 farmers got as much as $100. As a matter of fact, they received an average of less than $50 each.

Furthermore, it took approximately $18,000,000 to pay the administration expenses in Washington and in the States, and it took $26,000,000 for county expenses, making a total of $44,000,000 for administering the fund.

This is more money than was actually paid to 1,880,000 farmers, being more than half of those who participated in the program, and who got less than $40 each. These farmers received thirty-eight and one-half million dollars, and it took $44,000,000 to administer the fund.

After deducting the $107,000,000 which was paid to the 3,000,000 farmers, we have a balance, in round figures, of $208,000,000, which was divided among the remaining one-fifth of the farmers.

So it would appear that the remaining one-fifth of those who took part in this program in 1937 received approximately $200,000,000, or two-thirds of the amount actually distributed in soil-conservation payments.

I have given this explanation to you because so many farmers get the idea that they have received, or are receiving, a large amount of money from the Government, while in fact it is a very small amount considering the tremendous increase in the tax burden during the last 10 years. You may be interested in knowing the amount that the State of Wisconsin has received during 1936, 1937, and 1938 for the agricultural-conservation program. In 1936 Wisconsin received $11,307,000; in 1937, $8,134,000; and in 1938, $9,777,000. In 1933–34 the Government, through the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation bought in the open market in round figures $14,000,000 worth of dairy products for the purpose of supporting dairy prices and distributed them through the relief administration. In 1934–35 between $5,000,000, and in 1935–36 a similar amount was used for the same purpose. In 1936–37 approximately $10,000,000 was used in buying the surplus that was weighing down the dairy markets. In 1937–38 this amount was increased to $15,000,000. And for the current fiscal year, the Government, in order to relieve the market, is setting aside $4,000,000 for the purchase of fluid milk, $2,250,000 for the purchase of dry skim milk, and $26,730,000 for the purchase of butter.

These sums do not include the loans made available to dairy farmers which with the above amounts aggregate an approximate total of $44,000,000 provided by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation for the relief of the dairy industry during this year.

I have given you a number of figures, which I doubt very much you will be able to retain for any great length of time, but they are fresh in your mind now, so let us see if we can find any reason for the great increase in imports of agricultural products into this country since the new treaties have been entered into.

Let us take up the first item—that of cattle. Under the Tariff Act of 1930 those weighing less than 700 pounds imported into this country the tax was 2½ cents per pound; those weighing 700 pounds or more, 3 cents per pound. Under the trade agreements the first item was reduced from 2½ cents to 1½ cents per pound up to 225,000 head.

Hogs, under the Tariff Act of 1930, a tax of 2 cents per pound was imposed for imports. This was reduced under the trade agreements 50 percent, or to 1 cent per pound.

Canned meats, under the Tariff Act of 1930, were 3½ cents per pound for imports, and this was reduced under the trade agreements to 2 cents per pound.

Butter, under the Tariff Act of 1930, there was an import tax of 14 cents per pound. Under the agreement in 1935 this was left at 14 cents, but under the new agreement of November 17, 1938, this was reduced 2 cents a pound and is now 12 cents.

Cheese, under the Tariff Act of 1930, was taxed 7 cents a pound on imports, and under the trade agreement this has been reduced to 4 cents a pound, and in some instances cheese that is imported the tax actually amounts to 3½ cents per pound.

Tax on corn, under the 1930 Tariff Act, was 25 cents per bushel on imports. It has been reduced under present trade treaties.

The tax on hay under the 1930 Tariff Act was $5 per ton for imports. Under the treaty of 1935 it was left at $5, but when it was renewed in 1938 it was reduced 50 percent, or $2.50 per ton.

Oats, under the Tariff Act of 1930, was taxed 16 cents a bushel on imports, and under the new agreement this has been reduced 50 percent, or 8 cents a bushel.

I give you these comparisons so that you may see the reason for the price of farm products going down in the United States. If our own farmers had been permitted to produce the farm products that have been imported into this country by foreign countries, then the prices would be much higher than they are now; but when foreign countries, who pay about one-tenth or less for the cost of production of these products than we have to pay to produce them, then they can ship them in here under the present tariff and undersell any of these farm products that our farmers can produce.

I have refrained from criticizing anybody for present conditions, but I feel myself personally that the tariff on farm products should be high enough so that the American farmer may get the cost of production plus a reasonable profit before permitting the goods to be shipped in from foreign countries that have been produced by cheap labor. Anyone who has been privileged to visit these foreign countries and can compare the standard of living of those countries with our own will realize at once that we cannot possibly compete with them.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I trust a few fighting Democrats may come in. I shall regret exceedingly if they are not present.

Mr. Chairman, I felt that this was a good time to carry on a sort of conversational argument, as it would not be difficult to be heard. I desire to make a few observations. Inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures is in front of me, I will explain to you why I have not this year, being the ranking man on the Committee on Expenditures, demanded a series of investigations. I have earnestly asked for so many in the past few years, and with no results, that I am simply tired of making such demands. I am forced to take this particular forum to make my remonstrances. I had a letter the other day asking me how many times I had demanded these investigations. This was probably because the writer had not noticed them of late and I feel called upon to explain. I desire to claim with some satisfaction on my part that during the last 7 years I have made many speeches on the floor of this House, feeling compelled to do so as the ranking man on the Committee on Expenditures. If ever a man could say with the greatest satisfaction, "I told you so," I am he.

Some 5 years ago I took the floor for 40 minutes, explaining that we would have a $7,000,000,000 Government permanently established. We have a $9,000,000,000 Government permanently established. In all predictions, when I was called the Jeremiah of the Republican Party—predictions as I foresaw them—what I portrayed was far below the full extent of the actual results. I spoke long ago about the asinine silver policy. It is more asinine, and so proven, than even I dared portray. I have complained about the gold policy. Everyone now is aroused and fearful about it. We have accumulated vast sums more than I ever predicted. Why was I so modest in these predictions? None of us dreamed of the continuous extravagance and "foolishments" of the New Deal before it could run its course.

I spoke about the morale of the people of the Nation. Contemplate it! Badly it was needed. Extravagantly showered over the Nation, even to the wealthiest communities, for vote-getting purposes. Morale! I may have illustrated before: He was injured on the job. The foreman met the little daughter and said, "When will your father probably be back to work?" She replied, "I don't think for a long time. Compensation has set in."

We are accustomed and hardened to receiving relief today. We do not hesitate to take it. Our cheeks do not burn when we ask for it. Rather our cheeks burn in anger if hesitation is shown in granting it. We have been spending many billions of borrowed money. I predicted 6 years ago a debt of $40,000,000,000. You might refer back to that time and note the ridicule following that prediction. Well, the debt is fifty billion now. It will be forty-five billion direct debt by next July and there are more than five billion more in notes that we have endorsed and guaranteed. It will be a direct debt of fifty billion before long. There is not the slightest chance of it being less.

The Democrats have built a house that even the Republicans cannot run decently without going into further debt. We cannot and do not tear down the house any administration has erected. We are forced to live in it. We can simply try to run it more efficiently. May I say to those Democrats who yesterday were so overjoyed at those large appropriations which they added "that he who sometimes grabs at the gravy falls into the soup."

It was rather sad for some of us here to watch the Democrats with such great glee raid the Treasury at the very moment when we are headed, as we certainly are, toward national bankruptcy. No nation ever did or can have constant deficits without inflation. That needs no argument. Everybody must know this danger. The Democratic Party must know it. But it is a habit of spending they have gotten into. We heard one of their great leaders on Wednesday, in a 5-minute speech, try to halt them. He stated that the economic stability of the Nation meant more to him than these appropriations. He pleaded most earnestly, but just as earnestly not very long ago he even threatened, as well as pleaded, that they vote for billions of dollars and the giving of blank checks that the President might shower the money unrestricted. So you see it is too late now for the leaders to check their former followers.

The country must have absolutely lost faith in the Democratic Party. We must change the occupant of the White House. Even the White House expenditures have increased its expenses 1,000 percent. If they listened to Mr. Dewey speaking over the radio last night the ears of Democrats must have burned red. He only gave facts—but so clearly and convincingly stated. I pause for a moment. No Democrat seems to want to interrupt me. I wonder why.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. There are only three or four of them here. Oh, there are more than that number.

Mr. GIFFORD. I took this time for their benefit. Some of us are very anxious that we have some change in the occupancy of the White House. This third term distresses me. However, I realize what a terrible state the Democrats are in, because other candidates would like to declare themselves, but hardly dare. Their punishment might be most drastic. My Massachusetts Democrats say they are for Mr. Farley, but if Mr. Roosevelt runs they would be for him. However, I do not think we can endure this leadership any longer. She said to him: "You are getting to be unbearable. It will soon be impossible to live with you." He hopefully looked at her and said, "How soon?" That is the way I feel about it. A change cannot come too soon.

Now, I rejoice here today that the Democrats who are here agree with me. And they are true Democrats. They are apparently not of the type of these New Dealers who do not care if they do plunge the country into national bankruptcy. New Dealers complain about economic royalists; but every day they beg them to furnish the capital to run the Nation. When banks or other people lend us money to carry on they can assume at some time some control of our business. The banks are now furnishing nearly all the money, and they may soon control this Government. Last year the country banks outside of New York City did not increase their portfolios a dollar in United States bonds. The New York City banks accounted for the full increase.

Mr. RABAUT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RABAUT. The gentleman would not say that the bank control is evidenced in the interest rate, would he?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; but in the end they may have power to control. At the present time we have issued so many notes or bonds and have so much so-called debt money that no one knows what to do with it. I want to make this clear, I have tried before. You give a note for a thousand dollars payable in 20 to 40 years. That is grand for the Government. You have created $1,000 in money that can circulate until the note or bond is paid. Every bond you issue, every bond that is taken by the banks, creates an equal amount of money, and we have now so much money that the danger of inflation is known to all. There is nothing else to do with this money but to buy more debt and create still more money. As I tried to say the other day, the insurance companies are being urged to buy more Government bonds because they pay cash and no new money created. There is much more I would enjoy mentioning, but you on the Democratic side have agreed with me so perfectly that I will yield the floor. I have enjoyed these few minutes at a time when others were not desirous of taking it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN A. HALL].

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am not able to talk about District of Columbia affairs even though it is the subject of the afternoon. However, I am very well versed in a problem which is particularly sectional in nature at the present time. I refer to the very serious hay shortage in my district, about which I spoke last week. I desire to emphasize that the problem which my farmers are facing is rapidly becoming a serious one.

At this time I wish to say that the farmers of my district are absolutely without hay and it is 2 months from now until pasture time when their herds may be able to get fresh fodder. I have gone into this problem very thoroughly with the Department of Agriculture and I point out that the measure which I recently introduced, H. R. 8312, better known as the Hall farm bill, is now pending for consideration. It has been my good fortune to obtain a promise from the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture today that hearings will be held on this particular measure.

When it becomes my opportunity to be designated a date for that hearing, I am going to ask as a special favor not particularly to me but to the farmers of my district that as many Members from agricultural areas attend that hearing as can possibly find time to do so.

My bill, in short, provides for a policy to be created by the Secretary of Agriculture that when a particular section has been endangered or has been stricken by an act of nature such as droughts, floods, fire, and so forth, he may be authorized to take steps in that locality as regards the regulation of the price of hay. I may mention at this time that hay in my district has soared to the fabulous price of from $18 to $22 per ton, and that unscrupulous dealers have taken the opportunity afforded by this unfortunate situation to bring hay and fodder from outside and take advantage of the farmers to bring in hay and fodder from outside and taking advantage of the farmers in my district by giving them short weight. Not only that, but hay has been brought in from other areas and sold to the farmers who could not possibly buy it at these prices.

I found that the Department of Agriculture was having trouble in making loans available for hay at $20 a ton. You will agree with me that no farmer who is facing economic bankruptcy today will be able to borrow money to purchase hay at that fabulous price when he is unable even to buy food for himself. Therefore, the presentation of this measure, while it may affect only my district today, may next year or the next year or the next year affect the districts which you represent. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

REPENTANCE SHOULD FOLLOW CONFESSION

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, an editorial in this morning's issue of the Washington Post, a great newspaper, published in the Capital of the richest and most powerful nation in the world, contains unintentionally, no doubt, the most devastating indictment of the New Deal, of the President of the United States, and of the present Congress that has ever been made of a governmental agency since our Nation came into existence.

This editorial is captioned "Erosion of Character." Let me quote from the editorial—

> In his St. Louis address Thomas E. Dewey accused the administration of "a fundamental lack of integrity, a cynical disregard of the principles of common honesty." These are harsh charges.

But they have been made before. Listen to this statement made by the venerable Democratic Senator from Virginia [CARTER GLASS], who unwaveringly, unafraid, has served the great State of Virginia in the United States Senate for so long; who has eyes to see, a mind to analyze, and the courage to state the fact. Long before Mr. Dewey began his campaign the Senator said:

> The New Deal, taken all in all, is not only a mistake, it is a disgrace to the Nation, and the time is not far distant when we shall be ashamed of having wandered so far from the dictates of common sense and common honesty.

Here we have the young crusading racketbuster from the city of New York and the gray-haired patriotic sage of the Senate characterizing the present administration as lacking truthfulness and honesty, without which no nation can prosper and continue to exist.

This editorial then continues—

> But Mr. Dewey did not stop at generalizations. He went ahead to cite instance after instance of broken pledges, renewed promises, and fresh breaches of faith.
>
> Thus he noted the President's repudiation of the gold standard soon after his election upon a platform advocating a "sound currency," and his repeated promises to balance the Budget, ending with conversion to a spending theory which associates budget-balancing with disaster.
>
> Mr. Dewey also passed in review the administration's attempt to "undermine the Constitution"—notably the proposal to pack the Supreme Court, and subsequent unsuccessful efforts to effect a "political purge" of the lawmakers who had opposed the Court-packing plan.
> It is not an adequate answer to say that platform promises are made only to be broken. And there is a certain speciousness about the familiar argument that unforeseen emergencies justify lightninglike changes of policy. Mr. Dewey's target is obviously the President himself. And the latter's record is unquestionably vulnerable, because of the multiplicity of broken pledges that could have been kept without danger to the national welfare.

From the foregoing quotation you will note that the editorial does not question the soundness of Dewey's indictment, its truthfulness, nor does it charge that Dewey's recital of the facts did not carry conviction of that charge. The editorial rather seeks by confession an avoidance to excuse the lack of truthfulness and the lack of common honesty shown by the President's administration of his office up to this time. This attempted palliation of the lack of moral fiber in the present administration is given in these words—again I quote from the Post:

> Despite the vigor of the St. Louis speech it is questionable whether a recital of this sort will arouse any great amount of indignation. The fact is that the "erosion of character" of which Mr. Dewey complains in the National Government is paralleled in private life. Indeed, it is probable that the vacillation which characterizes our governmental policies is a reflection of the groping of bewildered individuals for a solution of the numerous social and economic problems that now affect their daily lives.

Here is an indictment not of the administration but of the American people as a whole and of this Congress in particular. Note again this sentence, from the editorial:

> Despite the vigor of the St. Louis speech it is questionable whether a recital of this sort will arouse any great amount of indignation.

What is the implication from that statement? It is this: That notwithstanding candidate Roosevelt's statement that—he has seen fit, because of political expediency, to so often violate his solemn promises to the American people that they have become accustomed to the thought that truthfulness is no longer expected from the Chief Executive of the Nation.

> We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of a contract to which they are asked to subscribe.

What a long, long way we have traveled from the days of George Washington when truth was held to be a cardinal virtue and the lowliest citizen of the Republic who failed to keep his promise was without credit or respect in his community.

If the thought expressed in this editorial be true, and there is some truth in it, the lessons to children at the mother's knee must be redoubled and emphasized. The old, old saying that honesty is the best policy must again, day after day, be brought home to our citizens so that undone may be the harm and the false doctrine which has been implanted in the minds of the people by our Chief Executive and those who surround him.

Mr. Dewey charged that there had been an "erosion of character" of this administration, if one may speak of an administration as having character. The Washington Post charges that the "erosion of character" of which Mr. Dewey complains in the National Government is paralleled in private life.

The Post charges that the "vacillation which characterizes our governmental policies is a reflection of the groping of bewildered individuals for a solution of the numerous social and economic problems that now affect their daily lives."

Rather the truth is that the people have come to have less regard for truth and honesty because of the lack of those qualities in the present administration. It is not the lack of truth and honesty in the common people which has seduced and corrupted this administration; it is the lack of those qualities in the administration which has undermined, and to a certain extent, dulled those virtues in the minds of the people.

The man who leads the way in times of great national stress, a Washington, a Lincoln, not only reflects the thought of the people, but serves ever as a real leader of the people by his acts, his conduct, and faithfulness to his public utterances, setting an example which all might follow with safety.

If there is among the people of this Nation lack of respect for truth, for honesty, it is because of the example which the Chief Executive has given them during the past 7 years.

The problems which confront this Nation today are no different in principle than those which have always confronted us as a Nation. No man worthy of leading us can excuse the failure to be truthful and honest by the whimpering cry of expediency. The responsibility for our present condition, for the carelessness with which we as a people regard the breaking of promises, the waste, extravagance, the borrowings which enable us to shift our burdens to the shoulders of future generations, rests not alone upon the shoulders of the President and his advisors but squarely upon us, the Members of Congress, who day after day fail to keep our promises to safeguard our Nation from national bankruptcy; from the destruction by governmental agencies of the liberty which our forefathers so dearly won.

Have we forgotten the old proverb—

As a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly.

How much longer will we violate our promises, and as a Nation continue to borrow and spend, submit to bureaucrats, Government underlings, stealing from our people the right to free speech, a free press, due process of law, a fair trial in our courts?

Read again and ponder well this editorial from the Washington Post and then, standing convicted as we do of undermining at least some of the necessary foundations of our Government—that is, creating a disregard for truth and honesty—let us repent and before the session ends, give a demonstration by our acts, that our repentance is not a sham and a deception. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired; all time has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For general supplies, repairs, new batteries and battery supplies, telephone rental and purchase, telephone service charges, wire and cable for extension of telegraph and telephone service, repairs of lines and instruments, purchase of poles, tools, insulators, brackets, pins, hardware, cross arms, ice, record book, stationery, extra labor, new boxes, maintenance of motortrucks, and other necessary items, $34,700.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask a question of the chairman of the subcommittee.

I notice in the bill that money is available for the construction of a new armory, based upon an authorization carried in the appropriation bill of last year. I want to know whether or not this entire amount is coming out of District funds or whether any of it comes out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CALDWELL. It all comes out of the District with the exception of that portion which is allocable to the Federal Government under the Federal contribution of $6,000,000.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Florida. I have a large number of protests against the appropriation of money by the Congress out of the Treasury of the United States for the construction of a convention hall or an auditorium, in the District of Columbia. The taxpayers back home feel that their money or Government money should not be used for such a purpose, and if the people of the District of Columbia desire to construct an auditorium or a convention hall, or whatever you might call it, for convention purposes, and so forth, they should pay for it themselves.

I notice in the report you have several legislative provisions wherein you authorize the Commissioners to enter into contract or contracts for additions to schools, and so forth. Is there any such provision in this bill that would take care of an auditorium, convention hall, or arena?

Mr. CALDWELL. There is a provision in this bill for the continuation of the construction of an armory.

Mr. COCHRAN. I am talking about an auditorium, convention hall, or arena.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; there is not. The armory is the only thing to which you might refer and the only contribution the taxpayers of your State may make is, perhaps, the contribution toward one-eighth of the total cost of the armory.

Mr. COCHRAN. That money for the armory comes out of the general funds of the District of Columbia and can be properly spent for that purpose, but what I want to make sure of is that there is no money coming out of the United States Treasury alone for the purpose of constructing an auditorium, convention hall, or an arena out of Federal funds alone.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman may be assured that such is the fact.

Mr. COCHRAN. Washington is called the ideal convention city. We have often read in the local press that political national conventions, outstanding athletic events such as the Army-Navy football game, and so forth, could be brought here if proper facilities were available. That is the business of the people of Washington but it is properly the business of my constituents and taxpayers to protest the use of their money to make provisions to care for such events, thus taking that business from them.

My home city, St. Louis, is a great convention city. The finest of hotel accommodations and proper buildings to hold conventions are available. The city is in the center of the country. The money to provide proper facilities for conventions came out of the pockets of the people of St. Louis and therefore I submit it would be unfair to use their money to construct suitable buildings and fields in Washington which in the end would certainly at least compete with my city. I hope the committee will always bear this in mind and if ever an attempt is made to authorize such places provisions will be made that the money to do the work come out of the revenue of the District of Columbia and not out of the Treasury.

The clerk read as follows:

For contingent and other necessary expenses, including equipment and purchase of all necessary articles and supplies for classes in industrial, commercial, and trade instruction, $4,000.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, everybody who seems to have anything to say, any place in the Nation, nowadays, refers to it as America's No. 1 problem, but if this Congress wants to take cognizance of the real No. 1 problem of this country they have it right here in the District of Columbia, and in the hearings at page 179.

In these hearings you will find that in the elementary-school system of the District, among the white children in 1930, there was an enrollment of 33,631 children, and in 1939 there was an enrollment of 29,951 children; at the same time there was an increase in the population of the District of Columbia from 468,000 to the estimated present population of 685,000.

This reduction is Nation-wide, and as Frank C. Waldrop rightfully said in his column in the Washington Times-Herald yesterday, you will not be troubled very much longer with building elementary schools in this Nation except to replace those that become obsolete. You will not need as many doctors interested in children as are required today, less teachers, less nursemaids, less clothing, less agricultural products, and all down the line. It is your No. 1 problem, and do not have any doubt about it. The absent child of today is the missing but necessary adult of tomorrow.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'NEAL. Consistency is such a rare jewel in these days and times, and so few people speak who are qualified as experts, I would like to add at this point that the gentleman who is speaking on this subject, certainly is qualified, having nine children of his own. [Applause.]

Mr. RABAUT. I thank the gentleman, and I am proud of it.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I am very pleased to yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. I think we should clarify the gentleman's statement a little bit as to the increase or decrease of pupils in the elementary schools in Washington. The testimony before our committee shows that the population of Washington is around 613,000, and the percentage of colored people in the District of Columbia is 27 percent, yet the elementary school population in the public schools is 43 percent.

Mr. RABAUT. Colored children.

Mr. STEFAN. The colored population in the city is 27 percent and the colored population in the elementary schools is 43 percent.

Mr. RABAUT. I want to say further to the Committee that after the above and surprising facts had been given to your subcommittee we were approached concerning the nuisance of the dog population of Washington.

As long as I can remember the subject of the poet's pen and the artist's brush has been a boy and his dog. I imagine if we could go back far enough we would find that the original dogs were domesticated to be the companions and protectors of children. Today, with the marked reduction in child population, we hear a great complaint about the excess number of dogs in the city of Washington, and while I am the master of a devoted Irish setter, the faithful companion of my children, nevertheless, I want to know who are petting all these dogs?

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I take this time in order to get into the RECORD the following letter from Mr. William E. Hayes, chairman, taxation committee, District of Columbia Bar Association, in reply to a recommendation carried in the report accompanying this bill, which I shall read:

The House Appropriations Committee, under date of Wednesday, March 27, 1940, reported the District of Columbia's 1941 appropriation bill to the House and in the report the Committee said, among other things:

"In recommending $14,040 for the Board of Tax Appeals, which is the amount of the current appropriation, the committee wishes to call attention to the fact that the Board is composed of a single member without any considerable training and experience in matters of property valuation, who is called upon to review and adjust assessments fixed by the Board of Assessors, which has the experience, background, and information to do a better job than anyone else.

"The Committee finds difficulty in reconciling a condition of this kind, and recommends that consideration be given to improvement of the situation by the appropriate authorities."

The purpose of the Board of Tax Appeals of the District of Columbia, as now constituted, is to afford taxpayers of the District of Columbia an independent review by an independent tribunal of every type of tax paid by the taxpayers of the District of Columbia, whether it be real estate, inheritance, estate, personal property, income, or others. The determination of the proper tax, regardless of the type of tax, naturally involves an independent review of the law, and the facts pertaining to the particular issue, including in many instances the valuation of property. The Board is quasi-judicial and determines the facts, including valuation, in certain cases, upon the evidence presented at the hearing. It is not contemplated that he should possess the qualifications of an assessor or an appraiser any more than a judge or a jury who is called upon to perform a similar type function in the ordinary lawsuit.

To leave valuation questions with the Board of Assessors, one of whom makes the assessment originally, is to deprive the taxpayers of the independent review to which they are now entitled and which can only be had by an independent tribunal, such as the present Board of Tax Appeals of the District of Columbia.

In response to a suggestion some time ago that the Board of Tax Appeals be abolished, 23 civic organizations, including the Bar Association of the District of Columbia, the Association of Certified Public Accountants, and the Board of Trade, and similar organizations, appeared and strongly protested the abolition of the Board of Tax Appeals.

It is felt that the statement herein referred to is a misconception of the purposes of the Board and its functions, and equally so to have the review of valuation questions of real estate revert to the
